CHATHAM, JULY 29, 1880.

The Hanging of Bennett.

Toronto, July 23. This morning Bennett expired on the scaffold the fatal act which led to the death of the Hon. George Brown. He slept quietly last night, and this morning declined to take any refreshment. He was clothed with Fathers Egan and Sheehan from an early hour, and at 7.45 the governor of the jail, Sheriff Jarvis and the hangman came to his cell.

The Hanging of Bennett.

"Yes," said the hangman; "it will be quiet for you." "All right; go on," said the prisoner. The strapping was then completed, and the procession to the gallows was formed, headed by two priests praying. Bennett preserved extraordinary courage, and mounted the gallows steps without hesitation. When upon the platform he came forward to the railing and addressed the spectators who numbered about 75, saying:-

The Hanging of Bennett.

"I am going to die and I am innocent of the crime. By no words that I can possibly say can I clear myself, and cannot say any more than that I am innocent as the act was beyond my control. The act by which Hon. George Brown met his death was done in an excited moment. I suppose he could not foresee the consequences. He thought I was going to use the revolver when I drew it from my pocket and he grasped it, and it caused the act which caused his death. His hand must have struck the trigger as the shot was fired simultaneously with his capture. I am going to meet my God now, and it would be a foolish thing for me to do with a life on my lips. I say here you may accept as a fact. I would not like to speak false when I am about to die, am possessed of spirit enough to have acknowledged the crime if I did it. The blood does not trickle in my veins that would let me to such an act. I am not false at heart or in word. It would have been a shameful thing to have done such an act. Mr. Brown did not deserve it. He was a most popular man throughout the world and deserved it, and he went to his death through my hand. I am not proud to be a murderer, and I do not intend to do so again. I am prepared to die. All I have to say now is, 'May God have mercy on my soul.'"

The Hanging of Bennett.

The rope was then adjusted, the black cap drawn down and, at about the first word of the Priest's prayer, the signal was given, the bolt was drawn, and at 7.53 the unfortunate man fell heavily to the end of the life-strangling cord. The neck was dislocated and death must have been instantaneous. After hanging for 20 minutes the body was lowered into an coffin and the same and preserved of the power of life, Carter's Sarsaparilla has no equal.

The Hanging of Bennett.

The following remarks in an article of the St. John Globe respecting this case, are just:- "We would gladly assist to repeal the law providing for the death penalty, but so long as that law is upon the Statute book it should be respected. In the case of Bennett, who was hanged yesterday at Toronto for the murder of George Brown, the law was wisely allowed to take its course. For, despite Bennett's denial, all the circumstances previous to the shooting indicate that he was fully determined either to force Brown to his wishes or to kill him. He said that he did not intend to shoot, but so far as his motives can be judged by his antecedent behaviour, and by his behaviour when he entered Brown's room, he undoubtedly intended to kill."

The Hanging of Bennett.

That curious and important ethical question, "What is the distinction between truth-telling and falsehood?" has never been thoroughly investigated. Yet it is a question which is constantly arising, at least during the trout-fishing season, and it certainly deserves the attention of all students of ethics and psychology. That trout-fishing both powerfully stimulates the imagination, and blunts the perception of the distinction between truth and falsehood, is universally conceded. All men, without distinction, seem equally amenable to this curious influence. There are men so dull that they cannot, in ordinary circumstances, invent the most simple fiction, but let them go trout-fishing, and on their return they will invent trout of enormous size and describe fictitious adventures of the extraordinary vividness of coloring. So well known is this fact that the late Horace Greeley held that trout-fishing furnished an admirable exercise for a journalist, and was accounted for on the eve of an exciting political campaign to regret that he himself could not find time to strengthen his polemical abilities by a little fishing. While trout-fishing thus develops the imagination, it obliterates in the mind of the fisher all respect for truth. A man who has lived a life of unblemished veracity, and whose word has been universally regarded as being fully as valuable as a Mississippi State bond, goes trout-fishing and captures a solitary two-inch trout. On this slight and unimportant bait he presently builds up a soaring Gothic superstructure of falsehood, ornamented by at least a dozen two-pound trout. In addition to these never fails to speak of a monster trout, weighing fully five pounds, which he hooked, but which escaped just as it was about to be landed. Some men do not even require a two-inch trout as the basis of their falsehood, but will create an imaginary string of five-pounders with the slightest bait whatever. No matter what a man's character may have been, if he once becomes addicted to trout-fishing his friends immediately and justly lose all confidence in him. George Washington himself, had he gone trout-fishing with his hatchet, would have rivaled Ananias in his subsequent account of his piscatorial exploits. Now, what is there in the act or circumstances of trout-fishing that produces this remarkable effect? Is it the rod, line, or hook? Is it the bait, whether natural or artificial? Is it the trout stream, or the trout itself? We know that trout exercise no malign influence upon men who cultivate the fish in private fish-ponds. These men frequently tell the truth as to the size and quantity of the fish in their ponds, and in comparison with the men who breed or capture them are conspicuously truthful. Neither do fishing imaginatively and pervert the moral sense when they are sought for perch or catfish, the longer a man fishes the diller and the more truthfully do he become. The man who habitually spends hours every day in angling from a punt in a mill-pond, where perch and cat-fish are said to exist, gradually becomes a monument of stupidity, and could no more invent a brilliant lie than he could row a race in his wretched boat. Must we then conclude that it is the trout stream which leads men into the ways of falsehood? This certainly seems improbable, for if there is anything that looks particularly pure and innocent it is the mountain trout stream. It must be noted that the further the trout fisher goes from home the larger are his lies. For example, the man who goes from this city to the Long Lakes and Rockland County streams, usually limits the size of his largest trout to two pounds and a half. If he goes to the Adirondack wilderness, he comes home with stories of having caught four-pound trout. In Maine he catches nothing smaller than six-pounders, and if he goes to the Nipigon region, he boasts of trout of eight or ten pounds' weight. In any case it may be assumed that he never really catches a fish which weighs more than four pounds, but just in proportion as his distance from home increases, his alleged trout grow in size. In fact there have been a few men who have gone as far as Oregon in search of trout, whose friends have subsequently been compelled to kill them because of their injudicious boasting of thirty-pound trout-which are an affront to human intelligence. It is a very remarkable fact that distance thus has land apparently which leads the trout-fishers. It may not, however, be mere distance only which accomplishes this lamentable result. We must remember that the further the trout fisher goes from New York, the further he goes from civilization. In Long Island or Rockland County he is seldom long out of sight of civilization. When he reaches the Adirondacks he is so far away that he can cast off costs and restrain blacking-brushes, while in Maine he can relax into complete lawlessness. Near four centuries ago a native of nature is a liar all anthropologists readily admit. The Central African native King has no conception of any obligation to tell the truth, and the Maine Democrat falsifies returns without the slightest compunction. LEADVILLE:-They were in Leadville, and when they had finished lunch they asked the price. The man said: "One piece of pie, 50 cents; one cup of coffee, 25 cents-75 cents each." The party grumbled about the price, whereupon the old man behind the counter straightened himself up, folded his arms in a dignified manner and said: "Stranger, look at me; do you suppose I am standing out here for my health?"

The Hanging of Bennett.
