

Perhaps it should be mentioned that the morality of the immigrants, especially those from Copenhagen and the cities, is not all that one might desire. Their acquaintance with some forms of continental life has affected them in an undesirable way. However, they are teachable, and in fairness it should be stated that in the majority of those who have become known to the writer, nothing objectionable could be seen. The Lord's Day Observance Act is reckoned by many Danes as a queer thing. In their own land they pleased themselves.

The Dane is of a warm sympathetic nature, though ceremonious to a degree. He is easily gripped by those who show a real interest in his welfare. Many of the younger generation give way to intemperate habits. There are few Danish Lutheran Churches in the Dominion and the immigrants, with their love of ritual, find it hard to get their religious needs satisfied. They appreciate good preaching. Some of the young people are inclined to be sceptical, but are always ready to listen to a new presentation of truth.

NORWAY.

The genuine Norwegians are a hospitable and hearty people. To shake hands with one of these children of the North is an uplifting experience, never to be forgotten, so cordial and so expressive of a truly loving personality. The poverty of their soil
