

MONTHLY CATTLE FAIRS. HARRISTON—Friday before the Guelph Fair...

HELEN MOIR

Love and Honour. A TALE OF THE CLYDE.

CHAPTER I. A NIGHT OF AGONY—A VISIT TO SLEEPERS—A TALK OF BARRON.

Bridgenorth knocked at the open door, and in answer to the summons there appeared a very little woman of some sixty years of age...

With the same cheerful alacrity their request for a draught of milk was quickly responded to, and a large bowlful of frothy freshness was set before each.

'You must feel lonely living in this solitary place by yourself,' observed Bridgenorth, after some minutes' silence, and in a tone the unsteadiness of which was easily recognised by Jaquin.

'I don't just live by myself, sir,' she smilingly replied. 'My godson is a shepherd, and though he is on the hills most of the day, he comes home like a night. Nae doot he has nae near neighbors, and visitors seldom look in upon us, but I have gotten used to that, and I think I like it muckle.'

'You seem to have had near neighbors once,' observed Bridgenorth; 'that is, if you lived here when the house was occupied by your father and mother.'

'Oh, aye, aye, aye, we lived here in the Moirs' time and a sair day it was to me when the house was shut up. I was eerie and lonely then, and thought it impossible that I could live in the glen by myself. It's ten years sin' aye, and year by year the bly boogie, since sae nae and coo, mullered and mullered aye, till it has come to be just as ye see it.'

'The people whom you speak of—removed then,' said Bridgenorth, 'from out the shadow—'went to some other part of the country, I suppose?'

'Alack, no! it wasna that—something far waur than that. It's a sad and a wae'ful story, sir, and interestin' to me that kened the folk, but I see a stranger like you it canna—'

'Ob, yes, indeed it is,' cried Bridgenorth, with startling eagerness. 'The sight of the ruined and deserted habitation impressed me much, and you will oblige me exceedingly by telling me the story of its inhabitants. We are tired with our long walk up the glen, and would rest a while from the heat in the shade of your dwelling.'
