The first of the fall and winter course of lectures instituted by the Woman's Art Association was held yesterday afternoon in their pleasant gallery up in the Confederation Life Building, and proved to be a most instructive and enjoyable affair. It was an extremely auspicious opening, the gallery being all too small to hold the host of people who wished to hear the Rev. Armstrong Black tell of Ruskin's contribution to the art of the century. The Rev. Armstrong Black tell of Ruskin's contribution to the art of the century. The Rev. Provost Macklem occupied the chair, and before introducing the lecturer reviewed in a congratulatory speech the work of the W.A.A., and urged the ladies to continue in the good work they were doing, especially with reference to the Public schools.

Love is hot, love is cold. Rev. Mr. Black said that Ruskin occupied a unique position among the great writers of the Victorian age, and in placing him associated him with Carlyle and Newnan. It was well to remember that he lived in a time when the old order was changing and men were first setting out on a wild career after material riches; against this pursuit of material things Ruskin had entered his protest from the first. He pro-tested, too against the polluting of streams, the building of ugly rallway stations and schools, because his love for all things eautiful was so deep that ugliness in any stantly been predicted, the shirt waist is form was a pain to him; he tried to turn more in evidence than ever. Indeed, it is INSURING AND KILLING GIRLS back the current of men's thoughts into the ways of beauty. After giving a sympathetic sketch of Ruskin's life, Dr. Black the hearts of women. Madame Fashion is discussed the special endowments of this great man, dividing them into these: (1)
