The first five of these classes of employment embrace a majority of the working people of British Columbia.

The difficulties in the way of insuring most of these classes of workers are administrative. There is, however, some experience to draw on in both Great Britain and the United States, where some of the above mentioned excepted classes have been brought under insurance. It is a matter for consideration whether Canada should include some of these classes at once, or proceed to gather experience in the administration of the more routine types of employment before branching out into the difficult and complicated classes. There will undoubtedly be some protest in British Columbia against the exclusion of so many of its basic industries.
