ROYALTY AT TORONTO.

As Seen by One who was Visiting There.

A Pen-and-ink Photograph of the Princess Louise — Her Personal Appearance — What She Wore — A Glanco at Royal

A correspondent of The Hamilton Tribune thus sketches the Marquis of Tribune thus sketches the Marquis of Lorne, the Princess Louise and Prince George of Wales: — The most perfect day of the whole year was that on which the Govenor-General of Canada opened the Industrial Exhibition at Toronto—Wednesday. It was, indeed, Queen's weather. The sky was an unbroken arch of opalescent blue, the air was pleasantly invigorating, and the sun shone brilliantly. At 2 o'clock a large company of excellent people were assembled in the grand stand, overlooking the race track. The judges' stand opposite was "set" with a red carpet that covered the steps leading up to it, and four the steps leading up to it, and four wooden chairs. To them were added two chairs, handsomely upholstered in yellow and crimson, and three hair cloth seats. A few carriages drew up and stood around the stand, a number of stood around the stand, a number of officials formed a group on the green sward, and men in scarlet hunting coats, rode prancing steeds over the field. There was not long to wait. A commotion at the farther gate, a glitter of steel helmets in the sun, the band playing "The Campbells Are Coming," and the vice-regal procession entered the grounds. The Princess bowed most graciously to the greetings of the populace, and the Marquis raised his hat continuously. As they neared the grand stand the music they neared the grand stand the music changed to "God Save the Queen," men lifted their hats, and amidst respectfully subdued cheering, the Governor-General and their Royal Highnesses THE PRINCESS LOUISE and Prince George of Wales alighted.

All eyes, we feel safe in saying, were fixed on the Princess. A perfect woman we saw, with a grace of figure and stateliness of carriage that was never equalled by any goddess of yore. A winsome, round, rosy face, with the expression of hauteur sufficiently modified by native kindliness to give it interest and intense property. It is a face to look at again kindliness to give it interest and intense piquancy. It is a face to look at again and again, and ever to remember. The blue eyes have a steadfast, long enduring look, but if the Princess had had brown eyes the circumstance might have changed her whole life. Whatever of coldness there is in the Princess' nature lies in the blue eyes. Her brown hair was in crimps on her brow, not banged, and was coiled low at the back.

THE PRINCESS WORE

a walking dress of golden brown satin, cut with a plain basque back, closed high at the neck and finished with ecru lace at the throat and hands. There was a pompader trimming on the corsage and a few flowers and a white handkerchief were thrust into the fastenings. The front of the skirt was garnished with some fine frills of brown satin, there were panels of brown brocaded velvet at either side, and the back was arranged in full draperies and fell over the small ruffics on the edge of the skirt behind. She wore gloves a shade lighter than the dress, a small capote bonnet of the brown satin with a bunch of pale pink tea roses on the side, and a tea black-jetted veil tied over the upper part of her face. No jewelry was noticeable but a pair of gold enameled chain bracelets. While stending on the pavilion the Princess. shaded her face with a sun umbrella of hunter's green silk, with a yellow wood handle. The bouquet that was presented her shortly after alighting she carried in her hands all the afternoon. During the exercises

PRINCE GEORGE stood by the side of the Princess Louise. He received his greetings graciously. He is slight and well formed, but not quite so round in the face as he is represented by the pictorial press. He carried his silk hat in his gloved hands; and was dressed in black and white hair-striped trousers and a cutaway coat of black cloth. All this time the Marquis is lis-tening to the address being read from an illuminated manuscript, and when it is closed and he has passed it through his hands, steps forward, leans upon his cane, and addresses the people. His voice is slightly strained as he endeavors to have it reach the people. But it is a decided blonde, his hair is almost flaxen, as is also his drooping moustache. He held his black silk hat in his hand while he spoke, and he wore a closely-buttoned Prince Albert coat, a cravat of dark blue, and black trowsers. His words were well received, but there was not the enthusiasm manifested that the not the enthusiasm manifested that the Toronto Globe's frequent "cheers" would indicate. The Guards, with the glistening helmets and the natty blue uniforms, were drawn up opposite the stand during all the speech-making. At the close, the carriage stood ready for the Vice-regal party, which they entered as the band played "God Save the Queen." It was changed to "The Campbells are Coming," as, amidst the shouts of the people, the certege turned into the exhibition grounds, the Princess into the exhibition grounds, the Princess KISSING HER HANDS as she passed. Then commenced an afternoon of arduous work for Her Royal Highness. The Princess Louise is a famous walker, and she took the rounds of inspection bravely, but her face was flushed to weariness before departments were inspected and the coffee house visited for a well-earned refreshment. The Princess always had a few words to say when the person in charge of a display was an elderly man. She never passed the whitening hairs of age without a gentle word and deferential gesture. The air was growing chill and the day late, when the royal party again took their carriage and with their attendants and the glittening grand dryng from the grounds. tering guard drove from the grounds. Durham, 1a, March 2, 1882.

"Eight years ago I had an attack of Rheumatism so severe that I could not move from the bed, or dress, without help. I tried several remedies without much if any relief, until I took AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, by the use of two bottles of which I was completely cured. I have not been troubled with the Rheumatism since. Have sold large quantities of your SARSAPARILLA, and it still retains its wonderful popularity.
