But I confess I'm disappointed in Charlie. . he isn't at all the man I took him to be . I've broken off my engagement with him because I realized it was you, dear Jack, that I cared for all the time. "Let me post your letter for you, April," he suggested in placating tones. But April walked by him and pretended not to hear. To intrust any of her letters to Charlie Davon's mercies was very far from her intentions!

She set off for the 'postoffice, strolling leisurely along.

The beauty of the sunlit countryside did not appeal to her. She loved the noise and racket of the town, preferred the heat of crowded restaurants to the cool freshness of the woods.

Trevor, however, possessed an aggravating affection for this particular part of the world. April remembered. He talked of buying a house down here. The girl had always strenuously opposed the idea . . . her opposition had been the cause of various "scenes" between them.

"I'd sooner commit suicide than bury myself in the backwoods," she had often averred, riding roughshod over his most cherished wishes.

But now, as she walked along, a sentence of Jack Trevor's kept recurring in her mind—that was the worst of solitude in the country—it made one think.

'Life isn't all 'take'—it's 'give' as il," Jack had declared. "Every one s to learn that lesson in the school A sneer came to April's rosebud

April gnawed the end of her pen for a moment, then began to write.

"My dear old boy—" The words went sprawling almost undecipherably half across the page.

"No, that sounds too familiar—after all that's happened." April tore the sheet across and threw it in the fire.

Expediency demanded a quieter, more restrained form of address. Jack was fastidious—and after her recent treatment of him he would be doubly critical—tiresome man!

ORGANIZED HERE FOR STUDY OF FEMINISM

Mrs. A. Noble Addresses Recent Meeting On "Women's Rights."

"The subordination of a woman to a nan is responsible for wedded unhappiness," declared Mrs. A. Noble, in the ourse of an address on "Women's Rights" to the London Women's Libertarian League last Wednesday evening. This league was formed in the city about three weeks ago for the purpose of studying the feminist movement and the great feminists of the day. Mrs. Noble, the speaker of Wednesday evening, was an energetic worker for the feminist movement in England. "That the vast majority of married romen are downtrodden is a fact which cannot be gainsaid," said Mrs.

Noble. "Man's wife, as his lawful serf, merits no words of encouragement or thanks, simply because as vassal to a man she is fulfilling the duty for which God intended her. "Many men, unable or unwilling to display affection and consideration for their own wives, readily bestow it upon a stranger," continued the speaker. "How many times have I witnessed with pain and regret a momentary shade of sadness pass over the tired face of a wife, when, on the entry of other men's wives to the home, the sulky and disdainful husband suddenly becomes affable and respectful: the expression on the neglected wife's countenance clearly indicating the doubt that possessed her, the question which tor-tured her—'Why does he not give that attention to me, I, the mother of his children, the unrecompensed toiler in his home?'

Married Life.

"Married life," maintained Mrs.
Joble, "is not an everlasting bliss as Noble, "is not an everlasting bliss as the first few months of married life seem to indicate. There are responsi-bilities in the married state, but they enpoble the character, and hence should CLEVELAND, Ohio, April 14.—War not inspire a young girl with fear. I am not adverse to early marriages, for, when young the character is flexible. Thus can a young married couple grow derstanding will follow its first councileit.

"Woman is the co-equal and helpmate of man," declared the speaker.

"She must claim her rights—the rights of an immortal soul. Men with every opportunity have failed to make use of their glorious privileges. Woman, because of her suppression, will appreciate those privileges when they are given her. Woman will regenerate the world!" Concluded Mrs. Noble, amidst applause.
