No. 85 YONGE-STREET, Toronto. It is a sad reflection to think that Four Medical Men Branded as Black cores, if not hundreds, of lives could have been saved in the recent disaster if a little ordinary precaution had been used by the passengers and the steam ship company. The lesson of this disster and of many others that have ocurred is that everyone on board a vessel of any sort should always have avaliable on an instant's notice contrivance that will support him in water should he suddenly find himself such a contrivance the passenger ought of the Discipline Committee, presented by to undertake the duty in his own interest. the passengers had been armed with life preservers they could have easily weather seed the sea during this half hour. As it is, several of those who were saved owe their rescue to their being kept affoat by a raft, which was crowded to such an extent that it would not support another person. A life preserver is not of much service in a shipwreck where the victims have no haven in sight, but it is an admirable contrivance for enabling a person who cannot swint to keep affoat when he is first thrown into the water, thereby enabling him to regain his senses and to take advantage of any chance of saving his life that may be ready at hand. As a rule, passenger vessels are provided with life preservers, but it almost invariably happens that they cannot be had when wanted. Alife preserver is of little value unless the passenger has it available.

After discussion the method the name was erased.

probably has never been emphasized to such a degree as through this most dreadful catastrophe. Someone should be made to pay handsomely for the criminal negligence that is responsible for the disaster.
