CHATHAM, N. B., OCTOBER 3, 1895.

THE SOUBRETTE.

When Mary White married the young lawyer, Vincent Allison, she promised him she would leave the stage and never return to it. And it was no secret of release from her pledge that he had kept scarcely any of the many vows he had made to her at the same time.

Of course her name was not Mary White on the play bills. The profession knew her as Antoinette Le Blanc. The leading lady said she was sacrificing when she married. It was absolute madness to give up the stage. But there must have been sedate qualities in her, for she turned from the theatre where she had been applauded nightly and retired so happily into her "home" that the whole period of her stage life began to seem like a dream.

Vincent Allison undoubtedly had a future. If he had paid as much court to the deity of home as his once fated wife was doing daily, his marriage might have proved the wisest step in his life. But after a month he returned to his old companions and treated his home much as he had formerly treated his bachelor apartments— as a convenient place to visit when all other places were closed.

One day he came home and found the rent man waiting for him. Mary said he had been waiting three hours. She wondered why he didn't wait at the office.

"I'll pay you when I get ready," said Vincent Allison, angrily, "I won't be hounded by your petty bills. If you don't like that you know what you can do."

The agent did. And the next day there was a "dispossession notice" in the house. While the truckman was moving the furniture to the more modest flat Mary had selected, she, riding on an open street car, saw a great tally ho go by, and Vincent Allison, bordering on the hilarious, was of the party.

Instead of tossing her checks, as he had done formerly when she mentioned domestic needs, he presently gave her in cash rather than she asked for, and said he would hand her the rest "by and by." Later, still, he sent her with notes to this man and that man in downtown offices. She supposed he was calling in loans he had made them. Time and again she recognized in these business men, those hurried, exacting, folly despising fellows, former habitués of the theatres where she had danced and sung. Of course they did not know her.

Presently she realized she was not collecting old loans, but making new ones. Vincent Allison was borrowing money. One day a lawyer to whom she went—a man who had tossed her squawks in the old days, and written her notes offering carriage rides and suppers—threw her husband's letter back to her with the explanation:

"I will not do it. I will not be a party to it. He is borrowing money from everyone he ever knew. Why don't he go to work? He had a better chance than any of us; if he hadn't married that Le Blanc woman. It is inevitable. Their extravagance would break a man with the income of a duke."

"Wait a minute," said Mary; and the calm strength of her address compelled him to pause. You have yourself paid a good deal of court to those same women in the past. What you say now makes your motives thin as paper in a not altogether creditable light."

"What court have I ever paid to them?" he demanded.
"I think I have some of your notes—though none of them was ever answered."
"Who are you?"
"Marie Antoinette Le Blanc, and I'm not extravagant. I know how to save, and I'm saving. But I don't think it's fair."
"I beg your pardon, Mrs. Allison. I really beg your pardon. Don't say another word. I was a brute."

He nervously opened his pocket-book. He offered her twice the sum Allison had asked for. But she would not take it. When she got home a messenger boy was waiting for her at the head of the stairs, with a formal note from the lawyer, inclosing the money her husband had asked for. She returned it without a word of explanation.

Vincent Allison did not come home that night, but about noon next day he appeared. With a woman's dread of debt, she had refrained from buying anything; and the scanty luncheon she provided him was by no means equal to the demand of his pampered appetite.

"Why don't you send out and get me some to eat?" he demanded.
"I have no money."
"What chance of the roll you got from Littleton?"
"He didn't—I didn't get any."
"But the lie half choked her, and she told him all the truth, and begged him to live differently. "You have a future," she said, unconsciously repeating the general estimate which his youth had earned.

ness and its disastrous result that she had not mentioned the fact to her husband whose dismay at what he considered discoloration and destruction of the entire lot of paper made from the mass was his worry for months.

He considered the paper spoiled and an entire loss, and suffered it to remain in an out of the way place as unsalable stock for four years, when in order to get it out of the way and to make room for her husband's stock, he sent it to his agent in London asking him to get rid of it at any price. To the paper maker's utter surprise, in a short time he received from his agent an order for a great quantity of bluish paper, and found upon enquiry concerning the sanity of the agent that the bluish paper being a novelty had taken wonderfully with the public. But he was in a dilemma, for he had no idea as to how to give the blue tinge to the paper ordered by his agent, and wearily tried without result for many days and nights.

Mentioning his trouble to his wife one day she admitted her carelessness and told of the way in which the paper happened to become spoiled by the bag of bluing. The paper maker was overjoyed at the revelation, found it an easy task to give the bluish tinge to his paper, and until the time of his death, which occurred many years after, he was unable to supply the great demand for bluish paper, so acceptable and relieving to the eye of the writer.—Boston Herald.
