THE Harvard Chair Company are making some alterations in the surgical chair they are now building and which will be found of great advantage. The handle used in fixing the chair when the patient is in the recumbent posture is now higher up and much more easily got at. It is also worked on a different system. The pan for antiseptic fluids is not now, as before, under the second cushion, but is attached to the framework of the chair, and a great deal better for laying instruments in during an examination. The folding mechanism of the chair is also altered so that when the patient has her heels in the stirrups the third cushion sinks downwards and backwards and does not interfere with the physician's knees as before. The profession will certainly benefit by those changes, and we think the Harvard Surgical Chair will find an even bigger sale than before.
