Irish question, which has already been jubilantly hailed by the ministerialists as a resurrection of ome rule. From his remarks as cabled this construction is not supported. So far as can be gathered, both sections of the Liberal party are agreed that a large devolutionary measure of local self-government is necessary for Ircland, but that it cannot take the shape ported to have said, and his words are notable, since as chief party whip he would not speak without full warrant:

"On the Irish question he remained exactly where he was befoe. He was a home ruler and should always be, but the policy of 1886 and 1893 was heroic, and strong as was the government, at any rate in 1886, it failed to carry that policy into effect. There was no reason to suppose that any Liberal government which could be formed would be in a stronger position for dealing with the Irish question. In that case they must do the best they could. His views were those expressed by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman last April. They were entitled to demand that the Irish people s oild be primarily associated with the executive management of purely Irish affairs, and for his part if he dil not ask for more he should certainly not ask for less."
