No Help Offered to Steel Industry
LONDON, June 29.—The cabinet is understood to have decided that it cannot grant the request of the British steel industry for a preferential duty in view of the many other industries involved. The shipbuilding industry, for one, has informed the government that it would strongly oppose any proposal to place a duty on imported steel.

The ministers, however, are said to have recognized that the steel industry is severely depressed and under-cut by foreign imports, and therefore they did not reject the application summarily but referred it to the civil research committee, which exists for the examination of such questions.
