Every time a sheep was found dead search was made for some trace of the animal that had committed the depredation but no track or clue could be found. The mysterious depredations continued for some time, puzzling the settlers, some of whom attributed them to supernatural agencies. Sunday morning, just before dawn, one of the settlers, a German, heard a racket amongst his flock that were penned in a small enclosure alongside of his house. Hastily taking his double barelled gun from the wall he crept out softly to the corner of the pen and saw one of his lambs struggling in the agonies of death in one end of the enclosure.

Cats are often found wild in the woods; they leave the houses of the settlers and finding plenty of food in the forest, they become as wild and fierce as if they had never been domesticated. Some of them return to the settlements when the snow falls, but others have been known to live in the woods the whole winter. They frequent thick cedar swamps where hare are plenty and manage to make out a good living. They climb into the branches of low trees over a hare path and pounce on their victims—tiger fashion—seldom falling to secure the hare when he comes within reach of their spring.
