

materialism. How, then, will our national ideals be preserved, much less purified? 'The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church.' From the bloody fields of Europe will rise a new spirit which will leave none of us as we were. And those of us Canadian-born Imperialists who have sent our best and bravest away, who see mothers and wives showing the stuff of women that make a country worth living for and dying for, feel that the days of princes and heroes are not past, that it is easier to believe in God and Immortality than it was six months ago, and that for many a long day yet we want to be known not only as Canadian-born, but as sons of the Empire."—From an article in Queen's Quarterly for January, 1915.
