> The International Fisheries Exhibition! The morning dawned wet and dreary, but at about ten o'clock a brisk breeze rose, which, whilst it did not once break the clouds which, whilst it did not once break the clouds sufficiently to allow of a single ray of sunshine penetrating the grey and watery veil stretched dverhead. It rained no more that day, and, as a result, folks speedily took courage, and a great throng lined the streets leading from the Palace to the Exhibition. From Mariborough House to South Kensington 1,500 of the Metropolitan Police, under the charge of Colonel Labalmondiere, kept order, and had a light task, for a better behaved crowd it would be difficult to have found in any part of the world. The procession of carriages, headed by an escort of cavalry, was a pretty one, though not much to wait some hours in murky weather for. But if to the general public gathered in the streets the scene was not as brilliant as it might have been, inside the buildings there was little
