Doetry. THE DYING SISTER

BY MARY HOWITT.

From the Forget-Me-Not for 1836. What matters it, though Spring-time
Upon the earth is glowing—
What, though a thousand tender flowers
On the garden beds are blowing—

What matters it, though pleasant birds Among the leaves are singing.

And a myriad lives, each passing hour.

From mother-earth are springing? What matters it ?-for one bright flower

Is pale, before them lying—
And one dear life, one precious life,
Is numbered with the dying! Oh! Spring may come, and Spring may go-This loving heart, this bright young life,
Will be no longer near them!

Two lights there were within their house, Oh, must these two be parted now, So lovely and so loving !

No longer on the same soft couch Their pleasant rest be taking— No longer by each other's emiles Be greeted at their waking—

No longer, by each other's side, Over one book be bending !— Take thy last look, thy last embrad That joy, that life, is ending !

angeforth thou wilt be all alone !-What shalt than do, poor weeper? Oh human love, oh human woe! Is there a pang yet deeper? Ah! yes-the eyes perceive no mon

Can it live on without that love

For which its pulse bent ever?

Alas! that loving, trusting, heart

Must sche, and bleed, and sever! Child, cease thy murmuring-God is by. To meed that mortal prison; Mother, look up, for, like our Lord, Raise thy bowed head, poor bruised reed; Hope comes to the believing!

Fither, be strong—be strong in faith—
The dead—the dead are living!

Even from outward things draw peace— The long night-watch is ended: The morning am upriseth now To new day-glory splendid! So, through the night of mortal life,

Your angel one finth striven.
The sternal suns shine not so bright

To join the spirits of the pure, Your chosen hath departed !— Be comforted—be comforted, Ye bowed and broken-hearted!

FOUNTAIN'S ABBEY.

From the Drawing Room Scrap Book, for 1836.

The remains of Fountain's Abbey are considered the finest in England. The cloisters are a was extent of straight vault, three hundred feet fong, and forty, two broad; divided length, ways by mineteen pillars and twenty arches; each pillar divides into eight ribs at the top, which diverge and intersect each other on the roof. Hore is a large stone basin, the remains of a fountain. FOUNTAIN'S ABBEY

Alas, slae! those ancient towers,
where never now the vespen ring,
But lonely at the midnight hour.
Fits by the bat on dusky wing

No more beneath the assemble film. No more beneath the planet ray. Those erches echo with the hymn That bears life's meaner cures away.

No more within some cloistered cell, With windows of the sculptured stone. By sign of cross, and sound of bell. The world-wors heart can beat alone. How needful some such tranquil phose, Let many a weary one sitest. Who turns from life's importent race, And sake for nothing but for rest.

How many, too hear-sick to roam Still longero'er the troubled wave, Would thankful turn to such a house A home streety half a grave.

The second invest, positive to present the present of the prese after the barbarian style, rather for display, than with reference to their use.

From the architect te the table decorator, there seems to be a total absence of genius for the real objects to be aimed at. Justines of proportion, narrown of colouring, and disposition of light, are the most dustrable qualities in any room, but especially in a dioing room, without any individual ornaments or objects to distract the atention; so that the moment one enters, there may be a feeling of fitness which is productive of undisturbed satisfaction, and disposes the mind to the best state for enjoyment. Attention should be directed to produce an effect from the whole, and not by the parts; for this reason light should be theown in the least observable manner, and not extentatiously from ornamented objects. There should in the least observable manner, and not extentatiously from ornamented objects. There is no art in lighting a fable by cumbrous branches; but there is in throwing a light upon it, like some of Rembrandt's paintings, and the affect is accordingly. The first is valgar, the latter refined. In the same manner light from windows should be admitted only with reference to the table; and curing dinner this view should be shut out to prevent distraction. With respect to the proportions of a room, they should be studied a tilt reference to the table, which, so I have said, should, in my opinion, be of the size to accommodate not more than eight per, and in point of with, I would not have more space than necessary for the convenient circulation of the least possible number of attendants in point of length, there should be room for a sideboard at one end, and a sufficient space from the fire place at the other; softhet the length of the room would be somewhat greater than the width. In respect to height, it should be proportioned to the length and with, and therefore the beight would not be considerable. A high
