Nature's Own Gas Works

A gasworks is by no means the only place where gas is made. Nature has her own gasworks. Instead of coal being used to make it, this gas can be generated from rotting vegetation, such as may be found on the bed of a stagnant pool. It can be seen, by poking a walking-stick into the mud at the bottom of the pool, when bubbles of this gas will be liberated.

Should you stand by with a lighted taper the bubbles would take fire with a succession of pops as each rose to the surface.

In winter, when these ponds are frozen, it is a common sight to see beneath the ice great "air-bubbles." These bubbles are not air at all, but marsh gas, which has risen from the bottom, and is imprisoned under the ice.

A small drill or gimlet is used to bore a hole through the ice, and a light is applied to the escaping gas. It will burn for a long time, and provide an excellent light for night skating.

At first sight it would appear that the burning gas used under the ice round the holes, but that is not the case. Owing to the gas escaping through in a fine jet, the flame does not touch the ice at all, but is actually burning a quarter of an inch or so above it.

It is marsh gas that causes the strange light of the will-o'-the-wisp, which is so often seen flicking ghost-like over swamps and bog-land.

There are several places in the world where an escape of marsh gas has been burning steadily for many years. They are regular fountains of fire, and if only they were in a place where they could be turned to practical use they would provide enough gas to light a town.

In one or two places these natural gas supplies have actually been used for practical purposes, the street lamps being lit by a permanent supply of marsh gas.

It is marsh gas, too, that causes the ever-present danger of explosion in coal mines. By cutting into a seam a huge quantity of this gas may be released. When it mixes with air in certain quantities it will explode with terrific force when brought into contact with a naked light.

Catching Cribbers.
TRICKS OF THE EXAMINATION ROOM.

Cribbing, or taking written notes into an examination, is still unfortunately practised by some school-boys and even university students.

Some years ago at a certain college, an "invigilator" whose business it is to see that no one in an examination-room crib or copies, noticed a student acting suspiciously.

"Will the gentleman who is 'cribbing' kindly leave the room," he said. Immediately two candidates sheepishly rose from their places and left the room. Apparently unsatisfied, the invigilator repeated his command and two more went out.

"The gentleman to whom I refer," he continued, "has yet to go. Mr. Blank, will you please go out."

At a northern university, during the course of a medical examination, the invigilator noticed that a certain student constantly referred to his watch. Thinking that the old trick of passing microscopic notes on the glass was being worked, he asked the student to show him the timepiece.

What the Watch Concealed.

The student did so at once, and written across was the single word "Sold." Nothing daunted, the invigilator opened the back of the watch only to find the words "Sold again!"

At another examination in the same university a candidate was seen at varying intervals to raise a sheet of his blotting-pad and then turn to his writing with renewed vigour. One of the invigilators, noticing this, finally walked up to the student and asked him to show him the contents of the blotting-pad.

The student blushed, looked embarrassed, and said he would rather not. The invigilator said he was very sorry, but he must insist. So, after more embarrassment, the student lifted up the top sheet of the blotting paper and disclosed to view the photograph of his girl!

His Priceless Wife.
Chatting over his American experience the other day, the Rev. R. J. Campbell told one of the best little stories heard for many a long day.

It concerned a clergyman in one of the Southern States who married a young coloured couple.

"How much Ah owes you, rev'end?" the bridegroom asked at the ceremony's end.

"Oh," said the minister, "pay me whatever it's worth to you."

The young fellow looked his bride over from head to foot with adoring eyes. Then he turned to the minister and said:

"You've ruined me for life, rev'end—you snah her!"

There's nothing quite as delicious in the middle of a warm September day as some of Ward's "scrumptious" fresh fruit "Crushes" with a little chipped ice.

Keep a dozen always in your ice box alongside the ice, then you've got the ingredients to hand for a thirst-quenching delight that is acknowledged, the world over, one of the very best.

Teach your children the "Crush" habit. There are fine tonic properties in the pure fruit juices used, and cooling qualities in the finely aerated water. Ask for Ward's Fruit "Crushes" and accept no substitutes.
