

Jeannie Sinclair,

OR, THE LILY OF THE STRATH.

CHAPTER XXVII. TRACKING THE ROBBERS—LYNCH LAW—LETTER FROM THE STRATH.

The morrow came, and the news of the trial that was to take place having spread through all the diggings, the miners left work, and flocked towards the tent where the culprit was held in custody.

The proceedings were of a rough, summary character, but were, on the whole, characterized by fairness. A judge and jury were chosen, and the prisoner brought out and set before them.

In the morning light Murdochson looked paler and more ghastly than ever. He knew how small was his chance of acquittal; and, if condemned, he also knew what his fate would be. In all probability he had but an hour or two to live, and the terrors of death having got hold of him, filled him with despair. The very look upon his face was a confession of his guilt.

The witnesses were our three friends, together with Jonathan Parde, and Moses Levi, and when the statement of each was made, the guilt of Murdochson was made clear beyond a doubt. He was asked to make good his frantic assertions of innocence by giving an explanation of how the bag and the nugget came into his possession; but his terror was too great to enable him to concoct a story of any kind.

The rough unsmooth jury immediately returned a verdict of guilty, declaring, also, that the money and the nugget were the property of the three Scotchmen.

"Hang him now," roared some one in the crowd, and the cry was echoed by the throats of lusty men. Murdochson turned his rolling eyes hither and thither, till they lighted on William, and him he wildly and pitifully addressed—

"Ask them to have mercy on me, sir. For God's sake, don't let them take away my life. I am your countryman. For the sake of Scotland, do what you can to save me, and I swear to leave the country immediately."

William was moved by the appeal of the cringing wretch. He thought also that death was too heavy a penalty for the offence, and he delivered an earnest and eloquent speech in his behalf. His disinterested appeal ultimately prevailed so far, that it was settled that Murdochson's life should not be taken. But he was not to get off with mere banishment from the diggings. He was sentenced to receive fifty lashes, to have his shoulder branded with the letter B, and afterwards to be hoisted and pelted from the encampment. The sentence so decided on was forthwith executed in all its details, and bleeding, writhing with pain, and half-naked, he rushed away at full speed the moment he was released, pursued by the yells of the multitude, and a shower of missiles. In a few minutes he was out of sight, and William and his companions having had their property restored to them, returned to the tent.

On their way they met a miner whom Watty had seen at Orton's Creek the previous day, and he produced a letter for Watty, which had come to the Post Office after the latter's visit.

The postmark bore the dear name of Strathmae, and Watty knew that it could be from no other than Maggie M'Pherson.

The hearts of all three beat with feverish excitement, for now they doubted not they would learn tidings of the loved ones in the Strath.

CHAPTER XXVIII. STARTLING NEWS—HAPPY THOUGHTS AND HOME LONGINGS—A PROSPECTING TOUR—A GLORIOUS DISCOVERY.

"Lord keep us a!" This ejaculation was suddenly uttered by Watty, as he sat on a round stone in the tent, reading Maggie's letter.

Over against him sat William and Robert, waiting in breathless suspense till he had silently spelled through the sweet tender portion, and reached a part whose interest was general, and which, therefore, he could read aloud.

Scarcely able to restrain their impatience, they bore in torture the minutes consumed by Watty's slow progress. William feverishly anxious to learn if anything was said of Jeannie Sinclair, and Robert almost devoured with anxiety to know if his Ellen was still faithful to her promise.

Things were in this position when Watty suddenly burst out with the above ejaculation—"Lord keep us a!"

"What is it?" asked the others in a breath. "Mercy me, what a dreadful job!" continued Watty, whose consternation was as yet too great to allow him to inform his companions of its cause.

"Is it about Jeannie?" faltered William. "Or Ellen?" exclaimed Robert.

And the youths sat gasping for the answer, judging they had something fearful to learn, from the extraordinary expression of Watty's countenance.

"A wif' law!" interjected the latter, still in the extremity of horrified amazement. "Good gracious! tell us the worst at once, adjured William in a broken voice.

"I declare I think she's poer! The believe it, was Watty's vague and tantalizing observation.

This was too much to endure, and Robert, rushing forward, seized him by the collar, and shook him violently.

"You stupid idiot, will you tell us what it is?" he shouted.

"Murder! murder!" roared Watty, at the utmost pitch of his voice, and looked around scared and terrified, as if he did not know where he was. The sight of Robert and William recovered him somewhat from his fright, and made him conscious of the duty of giving them information.

"Lord help me!" he exclaimed. "The news clean bamboozled me, and I forgot a'thether where I was. But now wonder, for murder it is, sure enough. Master, Lynedoch has killed his cousin, Sir Ferguson."

"What?" ejaculated Robert, losing his hold, and staggering back.

As a local application in the numberless diseases to which the skin is liable, Dr. Briggs' Allevator will prove superior to all the lotions, washes, liniments, cerates or ointments, commonly in use for such purposes. The Allevator, from its composition is designed to accomplish a twofold object, namely, through its emollient properties to soften and soothe inflamed and irritated surfaces and allay the distressing itching that accompany all eruptive diseases, and through its healthy stimulant effect to alter diseased action and enable the skin to resume its wonted smooth condition. There is nothing so desirable as a healthy and beautiful skin; therefore, a remedy that produces it, driving away all impurities, should be used at once. Sold by E. Harvey & Co., Guelph. Dr. J. Briggs & Co., proprietors, 208 Broadway, N. Y., and No. 6 King Street, West, Toronto.

THROUGH FROM CALIFORNIA.—The Hamilton Times of Monday says: "The first lot of passengers from California, by way of the Pacific Railway, passed through this city to-day, leaving on their way through a copy of the Sacramento Daily Record, dated the 10th inst. Thus, the time made between Sacramento and Hamilton was just seven days. The opening of the Pacific Road from Boston and New York will no doubt contribute to swell the growing business of the Great Western, as well as other through roads, and all will partake of the immense advantages which must accrue to the world from the connecting of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by means of a railway through the very heart of the North American continent. The express car which passed over the Great Western, bearing these passengers from California to the East, came through from Sacramento to city. Passengers may, therefore, pass from Sacramento city to Boston or New York, by way of the Great Western, without change of cars. The Great Western will form part of the through route."
