Sport in Fishing.

It is, perhaps, in the case of the fisherman that the highest attributes of sport are evoked. For his is, in its very essence, a quiet pursuit, and to a great extent a lonely one; where he is gregarious in his moods, it is a matter rather of necessity than of choice, and the unhealthy instincts of rivalry and competition which spring therefrom are to be deplored as a falling away from the true spirit of recreation. And, indeed, it is in this quiet and solitude of the natural world that the angler finds his keenest delight. Alone in the rank water-meadows, with only the babbling of the river and the voice of the birds upon his ear, or a sheep-bell faintly tinkling from the downs above; moored in some quiet back-water among the lily-leaves, catching every whisper that breaks the evening air, now the gentle nibbling of a water-rat, now the cluck of some friendly moorhen, and now the plunge of a mighty pike among the reeds; who cares to laugh and talk, and joke, amid such scenes as these? As the savage learns silence and gravity in the presence of nature, so man civilized unlearns his forced garrulity in the same peaceful communion. There is skill of hand to be exercised, too, when the spell is loosed? There are all the lessons of the waterside to be studied, the tints and colours of the flies, the eddies and weed banks, where the big fish lie; the deeps and shallows, the piles, the snags, the rocks. And if he tire of this, the inner cunning of his craft, where else may he find such relaxations as are before him here? Where such a museum of curiosities as by a river-bank? Where such picture galleries? Where such transformation scenes? In truth, it is good to be a fisherman, good for spirit, mind and body.—

The Field.
