Boston did her best for us last night, but we did not quite do our best for Boston. There were a good many vacant seats in Massey Hall. We had just been to hear Harry Lauder the day before, and we cannot spend all oud money on music, especially as our musical standards are not thoroly adjusted. It was a pity, however, for Toronto's musical reputation that there est orchestra in the world, as musicians of international experience and reputation aver, played the favorite Beethoven symphony in C minor, with Richard Strauss' delightsome "Till Eulenspiegel"; Mendelssohn's violing to Cert old musicians got together and hugged themselves and agreed they had never heard in London or Paris or Berlin such an orchestra. Still Toronto is cultivating a musical taste, and Harry Lauder was here the day before. There is a mistaken impression that "high-brow" people like such music as the Boston Orchestra performs. Still Toronto is cultivating a musical taste, and Harry Lauder was here the day before. There is a mistaken impression that "high-brow" people like such music as the Boston Orchestra performs. As a matter of fact, the high-brows are not half so keen on good music as the common herd. The first comment heard on leaving the hall last night was as follows: "That first number they played is called a symphony, and that symphony hal everything else skinned a mile." This is not the language of the high-brow, but the genuine musical appreciation of the masses. But it does not weaken our regret that there were empty seats. It is difficult to say anything except in superlative praise of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is so complete, so perfect, so artistic, so generously conceived, so flawlessly restlized that the only tribute one can pay is to form part of the audience.
