THE DOOM
In a humble little setting, in the suburb of the city, lived a somewhat aged maiden. Who was neither tall or pretty.

All who passed her lowly out, in carriage or on foot. If she stood in her doorway, would scarcely turn to look.

Her face was kind, it homely, and the bloom had left her cheek; but her home tho' poor and lonely, was always clean and neat.

But this was no attraction for the young and giddy throng, who glanced in her direction, as they quickly hurried on.

But things have changed within the cot. This month ago or more, and fifty ardent suitors, pressed around the cottage door.

The reason of this mighty change, I hear the people say, is because she over some ages, on the shore of Confeary Bay, RUBIRD TIPLING, St. John, Feb. 16, 1912.

Another Magnificent Literary Feature

"NICKEL" - Monday - Tuesday
Robert Browning's Scholarly

'A Bolt on The Escutcheon'
There is possibly no literary classic better known than this work of Browning in which he presents in his inimitable manner the result of vanity. Thorold, Earl of Tresham, proud of his ancestral escutcheon, which he claims shows no tawdry, welcomes the proposal of Henry, Earl of Marston, for his sister's hand. Henry and Mildred have already met and now attempt reparation, but the stately Earl considers his escutcheon blotted and in a fury of rage sets about to rectify—as he supposes—the previous wrong.

"The Motion Picture World's" Criticism:
"An excellent two-reel picture of a very interesting plot. Browning's scenario stands out clearly as shown, and the story is intensely dramatic. The noted author's peculiar style is noticeable as the picture proceeds, and the classic as filmed contains all the elements of picture drama. The Biograph producer has made a scholarly play of it in every way, and deserves high commendation. Browning's philosophy is a little hard—perhaps perhaps—and the story is apt not to please all, but the writing is very famous and the situations poignantly intense. It is easily the month's greatest picture. It should be advertised among school children, teachers, literary students, and people of culture generally. It is just the medium to win new recruits to the millions of photo-play patrons. The picture should not be marred with inappropriate, trashy music."
