Proportional Representation

(By David Blyth)

There are a great many things about proportional representation I do not understand, but there are two things about the system that I do most thoroughly appreciate. One of these is that the vote of the individual citizen counts as it never did before. His choice influences the result, not merely as between the standard bearers of particular groups, but as between each individual candidate nominated within the larger groups. For example if we were to find two Labor candidates themselves elected, giving away votes to other Labor candidates, these two men would obviously stand in an entirely different position to the Labor party as a whole from the candidates to whom they gave votes even though the latter were elected as well as themselves. Consequently the individual voter counts as he never did before. He is not registering for a party which must win or to poll a vote for a party that must lose, he is registering to vote in a fight upon whose result his individual choice will have exactly the same effect as every other individual choice, and which will bear his individual choice printed on the face of the result. The other matter is that it makes no difference where a voter lives. If an adherent of Labor lives in the south of the city his vote has precisely the same effect upon the provincial representation as if he lives in the north and. No voter can lose his vote by dwelling in a hopelessly antagonistic neighborhood. Some do not register because they say "Oh what's the use? The Labor man will get in anyway," and others because they say "Oh what's the use? The Labor candidate has no chance here." Under proportional representation the one of these has a deciding voice in what brand of Labor man gets in at the top of the polls, and the other has just as much to say about the general result as though his neighbors were all of his way of thinking.

In the coming provincial election we have to choose part of the machinery to which the process of reconstruction is to be entrusted. The candidates in Winnipeg should be weighed as well as counted and labelled. Proportional representation permits of their being weighed and set in their appropriate place.—Western Labor News.

Organized labor has reached a point where its power attracts attention. Its demand for the right of collective bargaining and representation in industry is receiving thoughtful consideration. Labor is entitled to it and must have its rights.
