Pulpwood. A lively campaign is being centred in Washington in favor of bludgeoning Canadian provinces that have restrictions against the export of their pulpwood into lifting them in order that United States newsprint mills may get unlimited supplies of raw material. The American view of the situation, builded as it is upon false premises, is intensified by a despatch from Montreal which recently appeared in the Wall Street Journal. New York, containing this, among other statements: "It would take 244 other statements; "It would take 244 years to exhaust the Canadian pulpwood limits at the current rate of consumption if the estimate of the consumption if the estimate of the Dominion Commission of Conservation be reasonably accurate. The limits contain at least 1.033.000,000 bords, a third in Quebec Province."

An official denial by the commission that it had ever made or authorized such a statement was scarcely needed by those who have followed its insistent warnings that there is a measureable limit to our forest wealth, which is being appreciably wealth, which is being appreciably Toronto University.

In its survey of the existing supplies in Quebec the bulletin quoted dealing with the principal and best woods for paper making—spruce and balsam—and basing its estimates on official statistics and surveys of such woods commercially accessible, figures that there are 155,000,000 cords actually available. On the basis of ures that there are 155,000,000 cords actually available. On the basis of the cut of 1918, around a million cords, this would be the equivalent of 52 years' supply. Under proper management and protection, it is figured that it might be possible to realize an annual growth of five million cords of spruce and balsam in Quebec, but, as in the case of Ontario and other provinces, it is felt that the requirements to this end are not being adequately met. Fire, the at-tacks of the budworm on the balsam trees, and lack of forestation are the drawbacks not yet properly

In Ontario it is expected that the In Ontario it is expected that the cutting of spruce and balsam, which was slightly over 1,116,000 cords in 1918, will soon reach 1,500,000, representing "only 67 years' supply of wood accessible to existing transportation." A gross total of 145,000,000 cords of pulpwood is given as now available in the Province of Ontarlo, with 55,000,000 more in the event of the Timiskaming & Northern Ontario Railway being extended to James Bay, but the former is cut down to a net of 100,000,000 cords and the aggregate to 138,000,000 affeat of the cutting of the cutting
