British Labor Party
to Attend Conference

Delegates To Be Sent To Convention of Socialists In Stockholm; To Consult On Peace Terms Only

London, Aug. 11.—Decision to send delegates to the International Socialist Peace conference at Stockholm in September was arrived at by the Labor party yesterday after only a brief discussion. The party to be taken by the British delegates will be merely consultative, and conclusions reached will not be binding. William Purdy, chairman of the Labor party, presided, and opened yesterday's conference by saying: "The labor movement has given its best to ensure to the Entente allies a decisive victory over militarism, which has shown itself brutal in application, and determined to extinguish all ideals of democracy and liberty."

"Labor's inflexible resolution is to see justice done and reparation made, and that still is the determination of the great masses of the industrial classes of the country and the colonies. "No peace will be satisfactory unless it guarantees complete freedom from the aggression of militarism. "Our Russian comrades need all the sympathy the Labor party here can give them and there is no question of a separate peace. We must stand shoulder to shoulder until a righteous peace is obtained. We are sure our Russian comrades are not going to exchange a hard won freedom for a sham one under the heel of Prussian militarism. "The invitation to attend the Stockholm conference deserves careful consideration as the decision called for is probably the most important in the history of the labor movement."

Arthur Henderson, Labor member of the British War Council, was cheered when he arose to speak before the vote was taken. He said: "I address the conference with a deep sense of my own responsibility. It must be borne in mind that the situation in Russia is constantly changing. Otherwise injustice will be done to the merits of the case. Before I went to Russia I opposed the holding of an ordinary conference. On my arrival in Petrograd, however, I was met by the executive of the Council of Workmen and Soldiers' Delegates and in view of the condition of public opinion I intimated to them that if they were prepared to change the conference from an obligatory to a consultative one, I would recommend that the British labor movement reverse its previous decision and make a consultation possible. That position I maintain."

"The Russians wanted a binding conference to actually discuss peace terms. I made it clear that if our representatives participated there could be no question of negotiating terms. Our case is not properly understood in Russia to this day, and to have refused pointblank to consider the question would have done incalculable harm. The Russians still insist upon a binding conference. British labor would be placed in a most dangerous position by sending delegates to such a meeting. "I still favor a consultative conference with a proposal to leave the decision as to that to the conference, but it should be settled from the standpoint of national interests and not of party."

MARSEILLAISE
124 YEARS OLD

Great National Song Of France Was Written In Times of Stress

The greatest of war songs is the "Marseillaise." No song was ever written that so inspired armed hosts or so wrought vast, warm-blooded multitudes to frenzy. This great song was composed by a young artillery officer, Rouget de Lisle, in 1793. Rouget was from Marseilles, which circumstance gave his song its name, but it was written at Strasbourg, where the young officer was stationed. The time was just ripe for such a song. The bloody revolution had France in its grip. Louis XVI. had just been executed and nearly all Europe, full armed, was leagued against France and her democratic government. The republican army was at the frontier of the Rhine, struggling against the combined forces of the emperors and kings.

As consul and then emperor, Napoleon feared this appeal of freedom. It would not do to have his people singing of liberty and shouting death to tyrants. So he forbade its playing or singing. The sovereigns that succeeded Bonaparte were quite as unwilling as he that the people should be stirred by this song of liberty, and both Charles X. and Louis Philippe continued to suppress it. Likewise Napoleon III. would not permit it to be heard.

Thus it happened that three times only during the 70 years that elapsed between the rise of the first Napoleon and the downfall of the third did this great martial air burst forth and intoxicate the French people with its fiery inspiration. Once, for the revolution of 1830 overturned the last of the Bourbons, Charles X., and once again when, in 1848, his successor, Louis Philippe, was driven from his throne. The third time was a memorable occasion. It was in 1870, just after the war had been declared against Prussia. A great military fête occurred at the palace of St. Cloud. Thousands of aristocrats, officers and soldiers were gathered in its beautiful park and stately halls. Napoleon III., who had always before strongly forbidden the song, but who knew its thrilling effect in stirring the ardor of the people and the valor of the troops, of a sudden gave a signal to the bands, and with one accord they struck up the long-unheard "Marseillaise." A wild scene ensued. The song had struck a deep chord in every French heart, and the regiments marched away for the seat of war as its defiant strains filled the air.

BRIGADIER ASHTON
Tells of Five Days Manoeuvres Of His Brigade

Brigadier Ashton, writing to relatives, describes five days of manoeuvres of his Brigade as follows: "The five days were very interesting. I had under my command four battalions, the Machine Gun Co., a brigade of artillery, a field company of engineers, a field ambulance and a section of Divisional Train. We marched an average of 15 per mile per day, under active service conditions, with our arms and baggage. Men bivouacked on the ground, used their rubber sheets joined two and two to cover them. A skeleton camp was thrown up each night. The brigade was divided into three columns, each with its own baggage, and we carried out in new ground, so that we had to work entirely from the wire. All our orders came to us by wire. From the Divisional Headquarters, with which our signal people kept us in constant touch. We operated in Surrey, Sussex, and Hampshire, so that we saw a good deal of the country."

It was very hot the first day out, but we had very few casualties. Towards evening it began to rain. We bivouacked in Cowdray Park, quite close to the castle, and marched the morning at seven—ran up against the enemy about three miles out and had to put on a complete show to drive him out. Had a short halt for lunch, and it again after lunch. It rained all day, but the men did not seem to mind it. They can stand the rain, but the heat knocks them out. So each day passed. The first night we bivouacked near a small lake. Everyone was pretty well done out, and with the exception of the staff and outposts, all were asleep by 9:30. About midnight we received orders to move at once, and we cleared a point 5-12 miles away by 5 a.m. The night was as black as ink. You could not recognize anyone without asking his name, but we were ready to move. Trovovous struck, transports horsed and loaded, guns and limbers all formed up, a ration issued, men fed, hot tea served, outposts collected, etc., etc. and off. Marched the 5-12 miles and had our full past the point in time. You must remember that our column well closed up for night marching, was about 3-12 miles long, and at night marching, rate (2 miles an hour) takes nearly 1-2-4 hours to pass. It was our first experience of the sort, with so large a force, and we were more than pleased with the success of the move, under very difficult conditions. No one got lost. The move was silently and efficiently carried out, but everyone was very tired. We had nearly 4,500 men and over 386 horses, quite a large family to look after, arrange for feeding, foraging, watering, etc.

IS THE KAISER

The Amazing Prophecy
French Monk

Present War Foretold
Most Striking Manner

Is the Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany the Anti-Christ? The name of God is continually on his lips, but his appeal seems not to be the appeal of Incarnation to the tribal War God of the Germans, "our good German God," but an appeal to us so magnificently great ally.

"The Holy Spirit," the Kaiser portended to have said, in his prayer to his eastern army, "has descended on me. Because I am Emperor of the Germans, I am the instrument of the Most High. We death to those who resist my will and death to those who do believe in my mission: we and to cowards. Let all enemies of man perish. God demands the destruction."

It is an amazing fact that six centuries ago prophesied the coming of the Kaiser Anti-Christ. One of these sages was Brother Johannes, believed to have been a French monk who lived and wrote the sixteenth century, and his writings have created a profound interest throughout Europe.

Allegorically, France is represented in this astounding prediction as a cock, England by a leopard, by a white eagle, Germany by a eagle and Austria by "the other bird."

The authenticity of this document can scarcely be doubted. The Latin original was found in the papers of the late Adrien Perceval, author of a work in three volumes on "Prophecies," an editor of a work named, "The Annals of the pernatural," by his son, who translated into French and published in a recent issue of the Paris.
