And fans the brooding earth with icy wings;
Against the coast leud-booming billow flings,
And soughs through forest-deeps with moaning sighs,
Above the gorge, where snow, deep fallen, lies,
A softness lending e'en to savage things—
Above the gelid source of mountain springs,
A solitary eagle, circling flies.
O pathless woods, O isolated sea,
O steppes interminable, hopeless, cold,
O grievous distances, imagine ye.

On hearing this intelligence Mr. Calvert sighed somewhat wearily, and began to think that he had made a mistake in supposing that his sister could aid him in carrying out his matrimonial projects.

Miss Faber looked at him in construction, but though her lips were trustful eyes that she did not doubt the truth of what he told her.

"We shall go ever the papers could aid him in carrying out his stance," Mr. Calvert said after a pause.

In the evening the two guests arrived before Mr. Calvert had dute finished dressing, and as he entered the drawing-room he heard a gentleman talking whose voice seemed familiar to him, though he could not remain long in doubt, as on passing a screen that at first had obscured his view, he saw to his astonishment Colonel Faber standing talking to the rector, while seated on a couch by his sister's side was Mary, looking in a plain white dress more attractive than ever.

The hostess was genuinely surprised to find that her guests were acquainted with her brother, and as she looked keenly at Mary Faber, while her brother was taking the young lady's hand, a beam of honest pleasure passed over the matronly features of the rector's wife.

At dinner Coloner Faber, with his usual ingenuousness, told Mr. Calvert that shortly after he had met him he had been persuaded to embark his small capital in trade, and had lest all he had. The colonel added, not without a touch of pride, that he was now solely dependent on his little girl, who was able to earn a good income; and he told Mr. Calvert that if he could find time to call at their little cottage, it would give him much pleasure to see him there.

During dinner enly a few commonplace observations passed between Mary Faber and Mr. Calvert He did them up after glancing at them and seeing how bad they in the first story and the mand seeing how bad they in the first story which contained some and the point of the pound of the fact that he loved Mary Faber, but he felt as confident as ever that he ought not to ask her to be his wife.
