CHAPTER XXII.

There was no lighter, happier heart in the world than Agatha Lynne's on that the world than Agata Lynnes on that evening as she listened to the story of gallan's love. She had always liked him; there had been a time when she had pre-ferred her cousin. Lord Lynne; but he had not loved her, and she was not the girl to waste her life in vain sorrow and and not loved her, and she was not the spirl to waste her life in vain sorrow and regret. When Philip's image faded, Allan's took its place. She had cared for no one in London, because she felt that the loved her, and she liked him better than anyone else.

There was a deep sense of happiness in her gentle heart: there was nothing to fear. She knew that Philip and Inez bwould take her to marry Allan: she would take her to marry Allan: she would take her to marry Allan.
bwould take her to marry Allan: she would take her to marry Allan.
bwould take her to marry Allan.
bwould take her to pon her lips, her face wearing the glad look of a little child.
A How long she had slept Agatha did not know; the morning light shone grey and dim in her room when she was aroused by some one trying the handle of her door. A dreadful thought flashed across her for a moment; it rendered her helpless, and she fell back, unable to move. What might be happening while she delayed? Still, true to'her promise, she destroyed the letter before she quitted her room. She was hurrying along the corridor when she zet Stephanie, her sister'a maid. The girl looked pale and fright-ened. "Who is there?" she cried, wondering who could want her at that unusual hour of the night. "Let me in, Agatha," said her sister; "Itet me in, Agata, said her sister: "It want to speak to you." It ha moment the door was unfastened, and the sisters stood face to face. "Inez, dearest, what is the matter?" cried Agatha. She was stupfied at Lady Lynne's appearance. Her face was white, and cold. with knees.

The young baronét's horror at hearing of the tragedy was unbounded. "Can it really be true, Holland?" he naked of the trembling aerwant." "When we left Lady Tynne last evening, she looked well and happ." "It is true, Sir Allan," said the man, "and my master is half mad. There is no one to superintend any arrange-ments. Will you come to the Palazzo, for 1 do not-know what is best to be done? Lord Lynne seems as though he could neither hear nor speak." "Tears rose to Sir Allan's eyres as he remembered the look upon his friend's face last evening, and how he had smil-ed when he had bidden him call at three to morrow. As soon as he arrived at Lord Lynne's he asked to see Agatha. Years of bitter sorrow seemed to have passed over that sweet face since he asw it last. It was white, and dark shadows were beneath the large sad eyes. "Agath," he said, "my dear one, you must not grieve so much. You will be ill youres!r".

with its awful look, would have alarmed her." Once more she went to the window, and looked her last on the blue sky and the fair earth. "Farewell, life, beauty, hope, and love!" she murmured. Then came to her, as she stood there, a vivid recollection of Bertie Bohun; she saw again the brave young face, and heard the earnest voice. She remember-ed his words: "If ever you are in trouble, or want a friend, send for me." She wondered, with a dull kind of won-der, if he could help her; but no, the web was woren tightly round her, and there was no escape. tha Lynne sorrowed as one who has no hope. Others grieved for what they considered the consequences of a sad ac-eident; she alone knew the truth, and cident; she alone knew the truth, and it weighed her down nearly to the grave. Every word of that letter seemed burned upon her heart. She could not forget it; she could not forget the last de-spairing clasp of her sisters's arms, or the look she had seen upon her face. It was a fearful secret for one so young to keep, but she guarded it well.

"His last recollection of me shall be a pleasant one," she said, drawing the folds of her dressing-gown around her, "Oh, mother, mother," she murnüred— "the mother whom I never saw or knew —if you had taken me with you. I should not have been left to die alone." In the clear, calm stillness of the bright Italian night 'she laid herself down upon the bed she was never more to leave. The rich masses of hair fell over 'her shoulders-a few tears, so burning that they seemed to scorch her face, ran down her cheek, the last poor Inez would ever shed. Agatha wondered for some little time at her sister's strange visit, but her thoughts wandered to Allan, and then she forgot it in her busy dreams. It was the broad, clear morning light that awoke her at last—a sunbeam peeping right into her room, and seeming to re-proach her for sleeping so long. It was not until she was wide awake that the young girl remembered her sis-ter's visit, and the letter. True to her promise, she first looked at her watch— it was just half-past seven; then she turned to the papers and began to read them. A horrified expression gradually stole over her face as she read that confession. Pity, compassion, and shame succeeded each other rapidly in her mind. fied husband stood beside her. "Great heaven!" he cried, in a voice they never forgot, "she is dead!" Yes, dead and at rest, with a look up-on the exquisite face that awed them by its peaceful solemnity. Doctors were summoned, the terrified servants, with loud cries, seeking aid, but it was all in vain. She had been dead for hours. "I will not believe it." cried Lord Lynne; "she was not ill last night—not ill enough to die. T am mad or dream-ing—I cannot believe it." They could not persuade him to leave the room where she lay; he would not, could not believe that she was dead. It was not until the first bewilder-ment of this surprise had passed away that they thought ot asking how she had died. Alas, the question was soon answered. There lay the little vial emp-ty, aud marked, "Laudanum—poison," and the odor of it still lingeerd upon the white, cold lips. Then the weeping, frightened Ste-phanie told how her lady suffered agon-ies with neuralgia, and how she took a little opium to lull the pain. "Last night," said the poor girl, "my lady was ill with it; she must have in-tended to take enough to quiet the pain, and have taken too much."

So every one believed; there was no reason to doubt it. The wretched and unhappy commit suicide; but no care or trouble, they said, had ever come to the brilliant and beautiful Lady Lynne.

There's house. But you love me, do you not, although you have not known me bright and beautiful Lady Lynne. The news gradually spread, and a crowd of people assembled around the Palazzo formi. They spoke in whispers of the terrible accident, of the wealth and loveliness of the lady who lay dead, of the grief of her husband and the sor-row of her friends. But amongst that bady upon whom Nature and wealth had lavished their fairest gifts had hy her own hand cut short the life that her own folly blighted. "Agatha threw her loving arms round the stately figure of her sister; is derew the white, beautiful face down to hers, and kissed it again and again. "Thave asked you something in this letter, Agatha, "said Incz. "Promise me you will do it."

It seemed but a moment, and the terri-fied husband stood beside her. "Great heaven!" he cried, in a voice they never forgot, "she is dead!"

Too High Percentage. Toronto, Jan. 14.—According to the present intention of the Board of License Commissioners a number of druggists are to be prosecuted for selling tonics containing a larger percentage of alcohol than the law allows. By law no more than 2 per cent. of alcohol is permitted, but in a quantity seized for analysis it was found that one bottle contained as high as 14 per cent. Dr. Wilson, chair-man of the board, stated last night that the case would certainly be laid before the police magistrate.

Woodstock, Jan. 13.—A case of cruel-ty to his six-year-old child, which has been pending against Arthur Scott for some time, was settled this morning, when Magistrate Ball fined bim 850 and costs, which he paid. The stated charge was that Scott neglected to provide the necessaries of life for the child, wherely it suffered severe bodily injury. Secti was first arrested on a charge of cruelty and the case was dismissed. The child was then in the hospital, where it still is with so severe injuries that all its toes fell off, having been frozen. An arm also had been broken. Scott denied all knowledge of the injur-ies. Public indignation was an strong that the case was reopened and Scott was arrested again on a technically di-ferent charge. He spent several weeks in pail, then was before the Court of Appeal.
