some Information, Also, About These of Modern Make. The saw is of very early origin in the history of man, as many of the ancient structures could not have been built without it. The British museum con-tains sawknown by their stamp to have been made 2,000 years before the Chris-tian can. They have frequent mention in scripture, noticeably in Samuel, 1603 B. C., and in Isaiah, 742 B. C. In the stone age saws were made by securing pieces of flint in wooden handles with bitumen, and similar articles have been made their saws like cleaves, and with the teeth pointing towards the handle. The circular saw and other improve-ments probably came in late in the eighteenth century. — All work in wood is done either by sawing or cutting, and sawing is only a different way of cutting. The teeth of a chisel-shaped tooth is the best for a op-saw in theory. In practice, how-ever, the slender point of such a tooth will break away before knows of hard work here is more difficult, requiring the teeth to be filde well back for cut-ting across the grain, as the work hare is more difficult, requiring the teeth to be filde well back for cut-ting storm the sides of the point, in order to sever across the grain of the wood. The length and size of saw teeth must vary for the various kinds of wood, requiring to b shorter and to sever across the grain of the wood. The length and size of saw teeth must vary for the various kinds of wood, requiring to be shorter and smaller in harder wood. Svento ten teeth to the inch is about the right size for general purposes in hand saws. The same rule applies to the angles of teeth, the angles being less thrown forward for harder woods either in cross cut or ip saws. The set of the teeth should be no wider than is required to make the saw run smoothly, as more than this makes needless work. The set must be wider in green and sapry, or soft and spring woods, than in the opposite. Bubbing the saw with an oily rag helps by lessening the friction, also by prevening rust, and further, a saw should be chosen which tapers thin-ner to the back. In buying a saw get from the make of some reputable firm one with a thin blade, dark color, hung right and tight in handle, one that rings charly when tapped and bends evenly when springs the blade out of true.--Philadelphia Press.
