The pigeons welcomed her with notes of pleasure, and perching on her arms eat biscuit from her tapered fingers, while the timid hare feared not the sound of her footsteps when she happened near. The boughs bent to open her pathway to the laughing sunshine, while the leaves murmured affection as they were rocked softly in the trellised light. pleasure she could now know. She was very beautiful still, was this woman, though her youth was fast departing from her, and by stranger coming upon her, here in might easily have been taken for elder Dryad seeking the reflection the crystal pools. Her face now has the delicate fairness of the meado lilies, while her hair fell unbeet around her nymph-like shoulders wi the richness of a silken shield. As the evening approached she turned he face homeward, strolling through solitary aisles of oak trees that fringed the sloping hills. Their majesta bearing, proud in their eternal silance eemed to give her courage and patience, and strength to perform the duties that were hers. Though sle thought she had now lost her heart's idol, still the dreams of her girlhood were with her, albeit their fulfillment now seemed so far away. The velvet sod under her feet as she returned in the twilight seemed as cheerless as a pitiless desert upon which she accepted the desolation of her life.

As she entered her home upon her return she found a visitor awaiting her, who turned out to be a Catholic priest soliciting alms.

"I have heard of your noble work among the London poor," he said after an introduction by card, "and I have made bold to call upon one so charitably disposed as yourself, to solicit a subscription to a most wor-thy scheme?"

"Will you name the scheme.

"It is for the endowment of a college in which the peasantry of Amorose could find a free education."

"Yes, I think I have heard of that. You are Father Antonio of the Oblat Order.

"The same, your highness." "You priests are such beggars. But tell me, Father, what is to become of your nunneries? I thought they were for that purpose, in a measure.

No, not at all, your highness. Their purpose is more sacred than that. The object of the college is merely to impart a free secular educasaid, but I think your object very You may draw upon me for two hundred sovereigns, and I will place a cheque in the bank to cover the call."

"May the saints be gracious to your highness, I am sure they will be, though I might have been confident that one as fair as yourself would never turn a deaf ear to such a request."

"Begone, sir! You priests are such flatterers as well as beggars. But tell me, Father, have you any other subscribers to your fund in London?" "Yes; five, I think, but none give so generously as yourself."

"But you have many surely, who are giving more than I?" "Only two, I think-a general in the Italian army and an American gentleman named Hestmead " The woman started at the name, and a perceptible tremble passed through her. She turned very white, but tried to answer with composure.

"You see I recognize the name,"
she said. "I knew a Mr. Hestmead once, and my acquaintance and yours are probably the same. Does his wife belong to your congregation?"

"His wife? We cannot know the same Mr. Hestmead. The gentleman I know was never married, I think." ' Still I think it must be the same.' the woman tried to speak unconcernedly but her voice was unsteady 'What became of the Tuscan girl he fell in love with near Fontane?' "You mistake," the priest answered quickly. "That is, you mistake his sentiment, though I now perceive we know the same person. Mr. Hest-mead did not fall in love with a Tuscan girl near Fontane."
