TWO KINDS OF PRIZES.

Prince Pride was a very handsome doggy. He was a very proud little doggy, too, and perhaps he had reason to be, for weren't both his father and mother champion Boston Terriers that had won more prizes than any other dogs in the country. That is what Pride's master told his friends, and it made Pride very proud to hear it. What was more, his master said Prince Pride was likely to become a great show-dog himself some day.

All the little doggies of the street came to look through the big iron gate in front of his master's house to see Prince. When he was a very little puppy and was lonely for his brothers and sisters, he had talked to them and invited them to play through the bars, but after he heard of the wonderful relatives he had, he didn't think it was fitting for him to have anything to do with them. It made the other little doggies feel very mean when the little friend they were learning to be fond of, wouldn't speak to them, and when they heard him call them mongrels and street dogs, they were angry. Pride missed the other doggies, though he didn't like to think he did. He hoped some other nice dog would move into the neighborhood, but none did so. When his master was away, all the fun he could have was in strutting around the lawn trying to appear beautiful and dignified. It made him very angry when he heard the other doggies laughing at him when they went by the gate and saw him acting so, and he began to hate them.

The nasty feeling he had in his heart against the other doggies made a great change in him. When he was a puppy he had had a nice look in his face, but the nasty thoughts drove that all out, and left nothing but a proud and mean look.

One day a dog-show was held in the park. Hero dogs and thoroughbred dogs were to be shown. Pride thought now was his chance to show the street dogs he had something to be proud of, and he was very anxious to go to the show. His master was very anxious that he should win, too, and groomed him all up to go. But Pride only got a third prize. The judge said he was a very fine little doggy, but he didn't like his expression on his face, there was something that shouldn't be there, but he wasn't quite sure what it was. Poor Pride could hardly hold his head up but he was so ashamed and taken aback.

The judging of the thoroughbreds didn't take long, and then the hero-dogs were judged. Pride didn't know what hero-dogs were, but he soon found out. Most of them were the doggies he had called street dogs and hadn't spoken to for so long. A man read out a list of the brave things they had done, and a number of men and women were to decide which dog had done the bravest deed. One little dog had stopped a runaway; the big dog with the black eyes had caught a burglar; another had saved a little girl from drowning; and so on, right down the list, until Pride had heard of such brave deeds as he hadn't dreamed little dogs could do. The prize was given to a little dog that Pride knew quite well, but hadn't liked because it hadn't a nice family. It had given the alarm and rescued a little child from a fire. He was given a jeweled collar, and all the other doggies were given medals to wear on their collars. The people clapped far more when the prizes were given to the hero dogs than they had for the thoroughbreds. How Pride wished he was a hero-dog.

After he got home, Pride thought it all over. It wasn't what his father or grandfather were, but what he was, that counted, he decided. The judge must have seen in his face that he wasn't a brave dog, and that was why he had been beaten, he thought. After that Pride was very nice to the other doggies, and invited them to come and see him often. He found that street dogs were honest much more than good friends. He saved all his bones for the hungry little dogs that were lost, and became very popular.

At the next dog-show he was very glad when the judge said he had the right look in his face, and was the best dog in the show, but he was gladder still when he was given one of the hero-dog medals for his little hero-deed. He had been lost, and the street dogs were glad, too.

Cynthia Grey's Mail-Box

Beauty of London.
Dear Miss Grey.—You read and a little piece of poetry, not my own make, but a little verse I found in my scrap book, and as everyone is enough to something good for Christmas, I thought this a good pudding. Don't you? I liked that letter of the kind in today's paper. We certainly should be at peace now in the Mail-Box. Say, Miss Grey, I was through your city last autumn, just when the leaves were turning, and I don't believe you city folks appreciate your lovely city.

Mr. and Mrs. Rowe and daughter, Miss Ethel Rowe, King street, have returned from an extended trip to Victoria, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Brandon, and other western cities, where they have been visiting relatives. They were gone six months.

an ad. in both newspapers, but I did not get it back, although I stated in the ad. that it was a gift from my dear sailor brother. Write to me if you are enjoying this lovely winter weather. The Chirper and a bunch of us were out tobogganing last night, and my word, we enjoyed ourselves. We were all off again tonight, but a thaw set in, and so we have to stay in. We are writing our Christmas letters to the homeland. I am going to try some of those Christmas cake recipes. I will let you know how I like them. Did you or any of your readers hear Gipsy Smith while he was in London? We went to hear him every night and went to three afternoon meetings. My, but he was great. I would like to know what some of the Pages think of him. I think he has made a lot of different feelings among the people who attend various churches. Also he has wakened up some of the ministers. I hope the good work will go on and people will see that to love and serve God is the real best way to live. Well, I wish you a very happy Christmas and all the Pages lots of love to all. I remain as ever, X. Y. Z., the 2ND.

Ans.—We are glad you took advantage of the Christmas page. Glad, too, that your sick one is so much better. I'm sure we all were helped by the Gipsy Smith mission, and the inspiration received will not be forgotten. "No good or beautiful thing ever dies."

Never Written Before.
Dear Cynthia Grey.—Am a great reader of the queries in your Mail-Box, but have never written to you before. Can you please give me the pattern of the stocking-foot, and also give me the pattern of the tam o' shanter for girl of 12 years. Hoping you will not consider this any trouble to give me these patterns or tell me where I can obtain them. Please to find inclosed a stamped addressed envelope for your reply. Allow me, although I have given it to you the compliments of the season. A VERY GREAT READER OF THE MAIL-BOX.

Ans.—Pattern is being mailed with pleasure, and the tam directions may appear any day in the Mail-Box. We are very welcome to our group, and we hope you'll come again.

Patterns.
We are pleased to have received and filed many requests for the stocking-foot pattern.—Cynthia Grey.

Wants Recipe.
Dear Miss Grey.—I notice in today's paper that Captain was "Xmas" and the Bear. Am I right in sending it. Also a recitation for Modest Magpie. It was taken from one of the best elocution books, and I have given it with great success.
