NEW HOTEL FOR ST. JOHN

The Question Is Regarded a Very Important One by the Best Local Interests—A Few Years Ago It Would Have Been Considered an Impossibility.

The fact that our citizens are alive to the prospect of a huge hotel being built in St. John is a reminder of the failure of many large hotels to become profitable when liquor represented an important part of the business. A man a few years ago who would predict that hotels would make more money without liquor than with it, particularly in St. John, might have been regarded as insane, but in the Canadian provinces, where prohibition has become a reality, there are probably few instances where the hotels have not become more profitable than ever, indicating that business interests are benefited rather than otherwise by the change. The King Edward Hotel, Toronto, is probably one of the most glaring instances, and now certain local interests are ready to furnish a St. John illustration. It all seems another argument in favor of supporting prohibition.
