FREED AFTER 46 YEARS Once Famous Italian Bandit Scared by the World's Progress London, April 17.—Fifty years ago the brigand d'Angelo was famous in London. He was a young man of Palombina, a mountain town in central Italy. He killed the father of his sweetheart's uncle, and then fled to the hills and became a brigand. His method was to capture a traveler, rob him and then lead him to a priest. The unfortunate man was allowed to choose between leaving to die and having a bullet in the brain. d'Angelo had disposed of a dozen or more times before he was captured, tried and sentenced for life. That was forty-six years ago. He had just been released. He was discovered with 837 pounds in prison, and as his legs are paralyzed he was carried to the railway station, where a ticket to his native village was given to him. On the way he met a motor car and was terrified at the strange rushing humming thing. Then a cyclist came along and d'Angelo was much perturbed, but the rider should fall off. The prison officials say that during his long captivity he was never known either to ask a favor of any one or to break a prison rule.
