not even circulate across the country. The cost to the government, then, is not such a great deal.

But there is one thing though which might make us much more cautious. The Minister of Finance must know it, since the matter has been mentioned in this house. The secret intention of the group of ten is to head more and more toward an international monetary unit. This can be a good thing in itself, if it is used only for international trade. But the consequence is also that only the powerful countries in the field of finance will be able to control this international monetary unit, always at the expense of the small countries which revolve around those powerful nations. Canada is one of them and it should be one of the first to endeavour to protect itself against the creation of an international monetary unit.

We had the opportunity before to warn the Minister of Finance against this danger.

So we are informed that there will be an amendment to the act already passed by the House of Commons and approving those agreements. We are told that this will have to be passed by parliament and it is at that moment that we can try and convince the Minister of Finance to take the necessary steps, especially in view of the agreements which have just been reached in Tokyo, in order to prevent this creation of an international monetary unit which would only result in enabling, even more than today, foreign capitalist countries and big financial interests to have more control over the natural resources of this country.
