CAPITAL REQUIRED.

IN dealing with this subject it cannot be too often or too strongly pointed out that the money found ample to start one settler may be quite insufficient to start another. It is practically impossible to name any distinct sum and declare to all comers "With that amount at your back you may expect to succeed." So much depends upon the habits of life, powers of the new settler to make good use of what he has and so on. With this understanding it may, however, be said that with ordinary care and an average knowledge of the ways of farming, a settler may be able to take up a Government free grant and commence land operations on from £150 to £200. The more his capital exceeds these sums the better his chance of a speedy competency. It will be seen that many who are now owners of successful North-West farms commenced with even less than £100. This is, of course, still possible in some exceptional cases, but it is not generally desirable that any one with so small a capital should at once take up land on his own account. His proper course under such circumstances is, first of all, to engage himself to assist a good farmer that he may learn the ways of the country, have time to look round for a desirable location, and add to his capital, so as to allow of his commencing a farm of his own in a year or two with fair chance of success.

The experiences of settlers on this point are as follows. Their present postal addresses in the North-West may be found on pages 3—6. The addresses given on pages 7—10 show their nationality and their residence prior to settlement on the prairie.
