These grand projects seemed for some time to be what the French had actually in view, and the more to convince all Europe, that this was really there intention, a great many of their ship-carpenters were for several months closely employed in building a surprizing number of slat-bottomed boats in their ports, to be made use of as transports, and it was given out in September last, that they were ready to put to sea; and to make it appear the more probable, a considerable number of

n part e fame ing of s have ion of vith us rounds iquiry, cause, n danfolely deracy ig Hairit, in es, and tamely a vinhe had belongppears, ommon Could mor-

Thefe

dinto

vedes.

f Ha-

ave of r was ve that Vene-

> " In the progress of the war, we have had innumerable specimens of this great monarch's vigour and vigilance. Oppressed by numbers, deferted by those whose cause he supported, attacked on every fide, he was not discouraged, much less destroyed. His prudence suggested to him such dispositions of his forces, that, with all their superiority, the enemies found themselves every where opposed, and where danger pressed most, thither reforted the King in perion. The shame of being not refifted only, but vanquished in fo unequal a dispute, kept the allies united. Refentment held together those whom ambition originally connected. The perseverance of our hero was equal to his resolution; their new schemes were broken, and that they might not reproach each other, he beat in pitched battles every one of the allies. Every post brought us news of his impending destruction by Austrians, French, or Rusfians; every fucceeding polt acquainted us with his triumphs over these vain-glorious invaders, till fame feemed to grow hoarse with founding the praises of Frederick the Great. Such is the ally that Britain adopted, of fuch an ally, Can Britain ever be ashamed?"