

infusion of character from home, it must prove a heavy sacrifice to those individuals, who undertake the task. The climate, the soil, the accessibility of North America, with various other circumstances, offer nearly an assurance of success. The experiments hitherto made by Government, in those colonies, although far indeed from having failed, might certainly have been conducted in a more satisfactory and economical manner.

The settlers sent out by Government have been of that class which could contribute nothing but manual labour, and the transaction must necessarily assume a very different aspect, if parishes are called upon to bear a principal part of the expense. Settlements have been established also in a manner not quite judicious. They have been dropped too much at random, and at remote distances from each other, deprived of all the comfort and support which a more concentrated system would have produced.

It is obvious that, in dealing with our dead weight of population, two classes must be formed, viz. those who can, and those who cannot, bear a certain portion of the necessary expense of removal. With the first of these descriptions of emigrants, it will not be very difficult to make suitable arrangements: and as to the latter, there can be no doubt that much good may be attained by the establishment of an honourable and active agency in Canada, to ascertain and register the wants of the colonists, or public works, in regard to servants, artisans, and labourers, to receive and husband any small funds which the emigrants may possess, and generally to supply a link in the chain, which is at present assuredly wanting. In this way, communications might be made to the mother country of the probable supply required for the ensuing season, and much distress and disappointment prevented. It may be said that Government has, at this time, emigrant agents in Canada, and such is truly the case. But these gentlemen are engaged in mercantile pursuits, and are in many respects disqualified for establishing that connexion between the colonists and emigrants, which, it is thought, may be advantageously procured.

To some men, and those too of no ordinary stamp, emigration, under any modification, is an object of dismay. Viewing it as palpable encouragement of evil, which it
