There was once a non-party discussion in the imperial house upon a bill which would have extended the political rights to the better half of British humanity. The attorney-general and the solicitor general took opposite sides. The attorney-general was a pro-feminist. He said that many women had qualities of mind which fitted them to occupy the dignified seats—even in general answered that his learned friend and superior seemed to imagine that because some judges were old women old women were fit to be judges.
