Agent of World's Largest Fur Commission House Visits P. E. Island and Finds Conditions Satisfactory

Alfred V. Fraser, New York, agent of C. M. Lamson & Co., London, England, the world's largest fur commission house, lately visited a majority of the fox ranches on Prince Edward Island, with a view to securing the pelts for his firm's sales, says the latest bulletin of the Conservation Commission. Mr. Fraser was impressed by the industry's stability and considers the fox in the domesticated animal list permanently. He believes that the production of large dark-colored skins will not be overdone, and that, for the next few years, the darkest animals should be kept for breeding and the lighter colored culled out and marketed. The market prefers the black and nearly black skins.

Prices are much lower now than formerly, but will probably advance again when the war is over. The average value of the foxes seen by Mr. Fraser is probably between $200 and $300. In several ranches, where the foxes are black or nearly so, and are vigorous and well grown, the average value is several times higher and in a few instances the skins of individual animals will exceed $1,000. They are of higher value than the average wild fox because they are killed when prime and are darker colored.

Good Feeding is Vital
Mr. Fraser believes that, to rear foxes successfully, the farmer must be a prime stock feeder and keep his animals growing thriftily from birth to maturity. The practice in many ranches of restricting feed until the foxes are four to five months old he considers harmful. His opinion is worthy of consideration as he himself is a live stock breeder. He states that any defect in the food will be evident in the skin structures first, and the skin of any animal is the evi-

The stability of the industry was considered doubtful when the skins were placed upon the London market some years ago. Lampton's formerly held the opinion that, unless wild fox blood was continually introduced, the skins would deteriorate. Mr. Fraser is now convinced that no new blood is required as several ranchers had their foxes in uniformly excellent condition, and of an average size in force, wild foxes, while the color was very much superior to that of any wild animal.

Mr. Fraser's visit has done much to restore confidence among the breeders. He met several hundred fox owners and saw more than a thousand foxes. In some ranches he examined silver foxes bred from cross or "watch" fox parents, which were of good quality and constituted a profitable enterprise considering the capital invested.
