UNEMPLOYMENT
AS CAUSE OF CRIME
An Ex-Convict Gives His Diagnosis of the Epidemic of Hold-ups.

(The writer of this article is the author of the excerpts from the burglar's autobiography, "In the Clutch of Circumstances," recently printed in the New York Evening Post.)
Spectacular daylight robberies, bold hold-ups, and daring burglaries are becoming frequent and almost familiar nuisances in the streets and homes of our large cities. The police and the criminal courts seem unable to cope with the unusual volume of crime. The press is crying out for stronger measures to combat the increasing spirit of outlawry.
Some recommend heavier bail, others longer terms of imprisonment as solutions for the problem.
In the effort to check crime, there is a strong evidence of social hysteria. We read of a judge sentencing a highwayman to "life and ninety years after!" In one state the governor recommends the abolition of the Board of Pardons and Parole, in order to make prisoners serve their full sentences. A prison warden, a well-meaning and intelligent man, no doubt, abolishes all educational and physical work in his prison, leaving the men in complete idleness; and for their reaction against this condition of idleness, expressed in offences, punishes them every day until they "come to time."
This hysteria in attempted solutions of the crime problem is dangerous. It is expressed in offices, punishes them every day until they "come to time."
The principal cause of our present "crime wave" is purely economic, the result of general hard times and consequent unemployment. Since self-preservation is the first law of nature, the man out of work and without money would rather steal than starve. No amount of punishment will ever prevent men from attempting to satisfy hunger. All men, in this sense, are by nature's law of necessity potential criminals.
Furthermore, the man who deliberately sets out to commit a crime, be it highway robbery or the mere stealing of a loaf, does not consider consequences. He simply "takes a chance." If he gets caught—well, he feels that there are at least forty-nine chances in a hundred for a clean getaway.
If we turned to the hysterical press and the advocates of "Jersey justice," we should conclude that the swiftest and most logical solution of our crime problem is to cut off the heads of every mother's son caught in a hold-up or a burglary. We might even go further and suggest public executions and putting the heads of poisonous snakes on long poles in some public square as a warning to every criminal. But since we are living in an age of enlightenment and Christian civilization, and since public executions are no longer the fashion, we must find some other and less convenient and simply way of dealing with the crime situation.
Our jails and prisons are hotbeds of mental and moral disease, schools for crime and vice, dens which pervert mind and sap the energies of men and boys confined there, places of encouragement of brutality and cruelty both in the confined and the confined. Unless the offender is sentenced to stay there for life, prisons are a peril rather than a protection to society.

The writer, who spent fifteen years of his life in various American penal institutions at different times before his reform, five years ago, may claim to know whereof he speaks. He has seen young boys enter prison in the fullness of life and health, and he has seen these same boys depart mere physical wrecks, broken in body, mind, and soul, their hearts filled with bitterness and hatred, and the desire for revenge against society.
Neither the prison cell nor the dark dungeon, neither the ball and chain nor corporal punishment, ever tended to make a "bad" man "good" or helped to deter him from committing another crime. On the contrary, such practices have just the opposite effect. They not only degrade a man, but they make him more resolute and determined to "get even" with society after he leaves the prison.
In times of prosperity and work and comparative plenty for all we hear less of crime, of hold-ups, bank robberies, and the shooting of police officers. A normal man who has a good job and earns an honest living has no time or inclination to rob a bank or break into another man's house. He is satisfied in the work he is doing and the living it brings him. In times of unemployment, of industrial stagnation and idleness, he always finds a great increase in crime. It is because inactivity is next door to crime, especially when it is accompanied by hunger. As soon as our mills and factories begin to boom again and unemployment wanes crime will automatically decrease. Our politicians and one-swinging criminologists should give this fact consideration before trying to solve the crime problem by more stringent laws, rules, regulations, and punishments.

Nine-Year-Old Case Marvel.
Another boy wonder has been discovered. Out in Port Huron, Mich., a 9-year-old youngster has startled the followers of billiards by the exceptional prowess he has shown at pocket billiards. His name is George Asker. He has been playing the game but seven months and has progressed so rapidly that he recently made a run of 48, in spite of his short stature he never sits on the table to execute his shots, making a majority of them while standing on the floor, and seldom does he use a bridge. He shows fine judgment in selecting his shots, and his execution and position play are remarkable.

Run of 313 Points.
By running 221 points before he missed on an easy one-cushion shot, Edouard Horemans, the Belgian cue star, in New York, shattered his own previous high-run mark with a total of 313 points. Horemans' achievement was registered in the course of a special 18.2 balkline exhibition match with Edward W. Gardner, a local Class A amateur player. The contest was played in three blocks of 300 points each. In the opening block, Monday afternoon, the Belgian finished with an unfinished run of 297 and the balls were marked. Taking his hand at the table the following afternoon, Horemans ran out his 800 points in one turn and last night he negotiated 221 before his miss. The final score was: Horemans, 903; Gardner, 82.

HALIFAX WAR MEMORIAL.
Halifax, N. S., April 28.—The appointment of a nominating committee of five to gather a representative body to take up the question of establishing a war memorial in Halifax was the result of a largely attended citizens' meeting here last night. Discussion as to the form of the memorial was inconclusive. Mayor Parker suggested the matter might be left to the women of the Order of the Daughters of the Empire.
