

organization of the Combined Boards. Resentment, however, is not a useful emotion towards winning the war. Though we may have good cause for complaint over the manner in which the combined organizations have been built up, the aim must now be to improve the machinery even though we may not altogether like its pattern. If the view is not accepted that it is important to make the direction of the war more of a United Nations matter, then probably we ought to be satisfied with minor changes in the present arrangements, so that we may be assured of a constant flow of information on the work of the Combined Boards and of the right of easy approach to them when direct Canadian interests are involved.
