by the government. He noticed it did not mention the coercion bill number 2, last night, Mr. Ballour said the government accepted the lord's amendment relating to town parks. It was the government's duty to see justice done to all classes. The lord's had considered many of the amendments. It was time a principle of compromise was adopted. Mr. O'Doherty opposed the gross injustice of the amendment. Sir William Vernon Harcourt twitted Balfour witignorance of the subject. Mr. Goschen supported the government; Timothy Healy ridiculed the amendment; T. W. Russell agreed with Balfour; Mahoney opposed the amendment. Mr Chamberlain blamed the government for changing front at the instigation of the lord's. ing front at the ins ing front at the instigation of the lord's. Balfour characterized Parnell's reflection upon the government's motives as unworthy the leader of any party. He said the bill got in such a position that they must drop it or agree to Cadogan's amendment, In addition to other benefits even Parnell admitted the amendment would afford source reduction, yet, professing to speak in the demant's interests, he pretended he would look with equanimity upon the wighdrawal of the bill, thus laying himself open to the bill, thus laying himself open to the larkest suspicion. redress outside the law and constitution which were in the long run the only arguments parliament ever recognized. (Loud opposition cheers.) The government proved this repeatedly. He hoped this would be the last occasion they would ever have the power to afford such proof. (Cheers.) will be, it says, an election in a few weeks of a home rule house of commons and darket suspiceon. This language would afford those auxious to promote disorder in Ireland the strongest justification for their action. (Conservative cheers.)

T. W. Russell, Irish liberal-unionist, regretted that a section of the unionists again for the next stroke. However, a clinimatian has invented a "non-exgreated that a section of the unionists supported the government in what he described as a dear night's work.

Healy contended that the debate ought to be adjourned. He said they had understood the government would disagree with the lords' amendments. Therefore they had no amendments prepared. He believed this to be the worst years since 1847 for irish tenant farmers. Under the circumstances he would vote to reject the bill. He hoped the debate would be adjourned.

Smith would not consent to adjournment of debate. He asked the house to immediately dispose of the lords' amendments.
