A Western Mushroom Town.

The Chicago Times has a very lively corespondent on the Western Plains, who moves westwardly on the Pacific Railroad from town to town, as one frontier mushroom town after another springs into existence in the progress of this line. He has an ingenious way of praising the good order and morals of each town he visits, upon general principles, and following this by a catalogue of crimes, outrages and lynchings just perpetrated by its residents. At last accounts he had got as far as Rawlins, a place Dacotah teroitory, just laid out as a town, and which "has already a population of nine hundred, two large dancing halls from Benton, about fifteen drinking saloons and eating houses or tents." He first tells us that Rawlins is "as orderly as if it had a Metropolitan police," and then adds the information that "night before last a man was garroted and robbed"—that "last night a similar outrage was committed on another victim," and that "three men have been notified to quit the town, and if not gone in twelve hours, they will go up a telegraph pole and come down with a jerk—a rope in lieu of a necktie. I may have to chronicle their decease in my next." This is not bad for two day's work at Rawlins, in the very beginning of its existence. We presume that by this time there have been at least three score first class crimes, and two score lynchings.

The greatest silver movement yet—the estruction of the mines in Peru.
