Arbitration.

The numerous strikes which break out in many directions every year in the early summer throughout the United States and Canada, show that something is wrong.

These strikes do harm to many, and seldom do much permanent good. Besides loss to both sides, they cause inconvenience to innocent third parties. The right or wrong is seldom exclusively with either party; though each side, through failure to put itself mentally in the other's place, may honestly enough think itself entirely in the right and its opponent entirely in the wrong. That is the standpoint of average human nature, as it is the tendency of average human nature to try to have its own way.

How is this state of things to be remedied? There is one remedy only that fairly meets the situation, and that remedy the general public, if it knew its business and interest, would insist on. The remedy is arbitration. Even arbitration might not satisfy each side absolutely. Very likely; as the right or wrong in most disputes is not exclusively on one side. But by any fair arbitration, in nine cases out of ten, justice would be done on the average about as perfectly as can be expected in an imperfect world, and this side the Golden Age.

In New Zealand, obligatory arbitration has absolutely prevented strikes; dispensed even-handed justice; relieved employers from harassment and unfair competition; while giving employees the feeling that they also will obtain what in all the circumstances is found to be fair, as between man and man.

It may take some time for the United States and Canada to get into the happy position of New Zealand in the respect we have been discussing; but it will come, and we believe sooner than some expect. For example, a new organization is growing up in the United States among the employing printers of the republic, one of the principal aims of which is to settle, through a capable and even-tempered commissioner recently appointed, as many disagreements as possible by arbitration.

The Duke of Argyll.

The Duke of Argyll, who has just passed away, was the representative of one of Scotland's ancient and aristocratic homes. His son, the Marquis of Lorne, had the distinction of marrying into the royal family. The late duke was for part of his life a prominent politician, though he was never what could be called a popular leader. He belonged to the Whig section of the Liberal party—a section which has been very largely absorbed in the so-called Unionist party. The duke came at last to be a critic of men and things in general rather than a leader or worker. There is one point in his character and career which can be mentioned with pleasure, the deep and constant interest he took in science and philosophy. He cannot, of course, be classed in the front rank of scientists or philosophers, but he furnishes a good example, of which there are many in Great Britain, of men of wealth and leisure who devote much time and energy to the pursuit of purely intellectual interests. As a controversialist he was not a match for Prof. Huxley, but like Dr. St. George Mivart, who also has recently passed beyond the region of controversy, he helped to stem the tide of materialism, which at one period of the nineteenth century seemed to be so closely bound up with the study of physical science. Though not the kind of public man to call forth any intense personal attachment or awaken any widespread enthusiasm, in his own way the Duke of Argyll, though no doubt hampered by class interests, sought to serve his own generation faithfully.

A Striking Suggestion.

In the last issue of the Nineteenth Century the Marquis of Lorne has a suggestion for helping to people South Africa with loyal British subjects. He tells us that there exists a State Children's Aid Society. On its list of supporters may be seen the names of men who have held foremost positions in Great Britain. Its objects are defined as being these:

1. To obtain the dissolution of large aggregated schools, so that the children may be brought up, when possible, in families, or in small groups, where they will be in daily touch with the various interests and activities of social life.
2. To dissociate the children from all connection with the workhouse and the officials who have to deal with the pauper class.
3. To obtain for the state further powers of control over neglected children.

The very existence of such a society points to a great evil, namely, that in the crowded cities there are parents who neglect their duties. This is a sad state of things, but as it exists a remedy must be provided. The Marquis (now Duke of Argyll) points to judicious emigration as one of the easiest means of dealing with the problem. During ten years 2,410 children have been sent out, and the sum of £23,952 has been spent upon them by authority of the Local Government Board. The selection has to be judiciously made and the work carefully done. The example of Canada is cited, and the precautions required by Ontario and Manitoba pointed out.

Along these or similar lines the writer thinks child-emigration might be diverted to South Africa after the settlement which will follow the present war. There will, he thinks, be plenty of room after those who have suffered most for the white race have had the pick of the land. Little settlements might be formed, where clergy and school masters could bring up healthy, loyal colonists. "They would, in short, be bred up to usefully fill places in the South African union of provinces which shall keep for the races who have to live there together the benefits of the best characteristics of the European races." This may be a good idea; the new duke seems to have great faith in it; but like other movements of the same kind, everything will depend upon how it is done.

Not Peace, but a Sword.

Men have often been started by the saying of the Prince of Peace, that he came not to bring peace, but a sword. It was not that he desired war, or loved strife, but he saw what the result of his efforts would be, and faced it clearly and courageously. It is part of the mysterious moral order of this world that those who most sincerely desire peace are the means of bringing strife. The men who seek to make the world better, whether they act wisely or unwisely, do stir up strife. Part of this no doubt comes from our indorsement; part is, however, inevitable. No great commotion or war is stirred up by one line of action, or one set of circumstances. There are always many varied forces at work; and the final outcome is the resultant of powers which check and modify each other. We have an illustration of this principle in the present war.

There are no body of men who have been more anxious to avert war than the leading Nonconformists of England, and we may safely say that from that quarter have come influences which have helped to prepare the way for war. We do not mean that their outcry against war encouraged the Boers to think that they could go to any length in their defiance of the British Government, nor that their support of peaceful measures in the past has been construed as a sign of weakness, and an outcome of fear. There is some truth in these statements, but we are thinking of something deeper. It is the work of the London Missionary Society, on behalf of the natives, that has, during the past century, brought out clearly the difference between the ideals and methods of Britain and Boer. Anyone who cares to read carefully the history of the Colonial Office transactions will find the names of Christian missionaries mostly connected with the great Nonconformists of England. These men may sometimes have been mistaken, and some of them may have been fussy and indiscreet, but we know that among them were some of the noblest men that Britain has ever sent out into the world. These men were nearly always in conflict with the Boer as to the treatment of the natives and the missionary work of the church.

The comparative steadiness of the native races during the present crisis tells its own tale. As a whole, they pray for the success of the British because they know that it means justice for them. Many influences have no doubt tended to prepare the way for this great conflict, but one has certainly been the different ideals of the two peoples. From England, from Exeter Hall, the center of so much missionary activity, and the object of so many sneers, have gone humanitarian influences; influence directed to the freedom of the slave and the uplifting of the poor. Those who sent out these influences were always advocates of peace; but they have often learned that in that way where men seek for peace, they often find the sword, and their only consolation is the thought that if knowledge brings the sword, knowledge will take the sword away.

A serious accident occurred to A. St. John, near Holland, Man. While shooting a duck, his gun exploded, driving part of the barrel through his forearm and into his thigh. He is in a critical condition.

What Makes Home?

Home is made by the family. Without the love which comes with children there may be a house but never a home, in the best meaning of the word. Many a house which was only four walls and a roof has been made a home by the agency of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. Nature sets her face against childlessness and "Favorite Prescription" works with nature to remove the obstacles to maternity.

"I had been a sufferer from uterine trouble for about three years, having two miscarriages in that time and the doctors that I consulted said I would have to go through an operation before I could give birth to children," writes Mrs. Blanche E. Evans, of Parsons, Lutterne Co., Pa., Box 41. "When about to give up in despair, I bought a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and after taking it felt better than I had for years. I felt improved before I had taken one-half bottle. After taking four and a half bottles I gave birth to a bright baby girl who is now four months old and has not had a day of sickness. She is as bright as can be. I cannot say too much in praise of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription."

Dr. Pierce's Medical Adviser is sent free on receipt of stamps to pay cost of customs and mailing only. Send 31 one-cent stamps for paper covered book or 50 stamps for cloth covered book to Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

A DINNER PILL—Many persons suffer excruciating agony after partaking of a hearty dinner. The food partaken of is like a ball of lead upon the stomach, and instead of being a healing nutriment, it becomes a poison to the system. Dr. Parnele's Vegetable Pills are wonderful correctives of such troubles. They correct acidity, ment, they are just the medicine to food partaken of into healthy nutriment, if troubled with indigestion.

TWIN TERRORS.

The twin terrors of this season of the year are Pneumonia and Bronchitis. They hurry off hundreds of people into untimely graves.
