The Globe came out with a solid chunk of truth the other day when it spoke of the Liberals as being embarrassed. Only, in order to keep a good face, it took care to add that the Tories were in the same box. The two parties were "analogously embarrassed," so it appeared to The Globe's view. But, as we said vestered. The two parties were "analogously embarrassed," so it appeared to The Globe's view.

The matter of a reform of the system of Toronto's government should be pushed forward so that during the next session of the legislature it may be dealt with. Many changes are necessary. There are too many members of the council; the business of the city would be handled better with less than thirty-six aldermen, each one of whom is a law unto himself, often to the injury of the law unto himself, often to the injury of the best interests of the place.
