AGRICULTURE.

As Agriculture is one of the aris essential to the existence of society, it was cultivated in the earliest ages of human history. Cain the earliest ages of human history. Cain ers. We find it in a New York paper: was a tiller of the ground; Abel was a shep-herd, North planted a vineyard. That this art was carried to great perfection in ancient Egypt, is evinced by the dense population which that remarkable land must have sustained, in the age when the pyramids were in progress, and Thebes was in its glory. The poem of the Works and Days, by Hesiad, is To be exhibited at the Quarterly Meeting in April next, with a statement, of the man-ner and expense of feeding: a description of early Grecian Agriculture and the Georgies of Virgil, the Natural his ory of Pliny, and the fragments of Columela, and other writers, which have come down
