beyond the possibility of a doubt—although inexpressible by them in words;—but as the pathetic poet, in painting the blessings of language, and the reciprocal enjoyments of conversation and friendship says,

"'Tis speech that ventilates our intellectual fires . . ."

The use, advantage, and necessity of speech, or articulate language to every individual in a state of society, are so exceedingly obvious and striking that any farther attempt to illustrate them cannot but be superfluous.

In every station and condition of life, transactions must arise, even from our natural wants, to which without this faculty we should in a great degree be incompetent.

What purpose, then, more worthy of humanity than that of providing a remedy for a defect in many of our own species, which is so essential an obstruction to their happiness?
