

called upon, to enforce Obedience to the Commands of the Legislature. If the executive Power is too weak, to enforce Obedience to the Laws, without being assisted with an extraordinary Supply: Or if the Laws themselves require Alteration, it is then necessary, for the Crown to lay its Difficulties before the Representatives of the People. But if no Supply was wanted, nor any Alteration of the Laws desired, it might then perhaps be injurious to the Constitution, and dangerous to the executive Power of the Crown, to make the Representatives of the People the Council of State.
