British method.

The newspapers of New Zealand are already subjected to governmental supervision in this particular: When a person is arrested or arraigned for any crime, the newspapers are prohibited from "trying his case," making any comment referring to his crime, or stating that he has committed the crime. Such a police case is sub judice until the jury has rendered the verdict. Very severe penalties and fines, ranging from $500 to $1000, would be indicted for a breach of this law. The idea is to give the man justice, and not have his case prejudiced in the public mind, or the man's reputation ruined before he has been proven guilty by a jury of twelve men.
