

OCTOBER.

Superlatives.—A man so short that he can't look over a fence after he has climbed to the top. Another with a nose so red, that it serves him for a lantern in a dark night. A dandy so exquisitely delicate as to make three meals off the left wing of a common house fly. Another with mustaches so long that he uses them to brush away flies.

A few weeks since, says the Lowell Journal, a man from the country called with his keg at the grave stone maker's in this town, and asked if he kept the distillery. "Not exactly," says the man of gravestones; "Mr. ——— down the street furnishes the subjects, and I mark them."

There was an ancient superstition that upon the wings of that devouring insect, the locust, was written in Chaldee language, the words boze Guion—the scourge of God.

A thought worthy of herself.—"When two hearts, united by long, tried, and valued friendship, are divorced by death, 'tis the survivor dies."—[Mrs. Hemans.
