How She Went Home.

By Eben E. Rexford.

A wild, bitter night of wind and storm. The snow beat in fitful gusts against the windows of the old church, through which the light shone in a soft radiance, a little way out into the night. The wind eddied and whirled among the leafless trees, and sighed about the steeples where the bells hung, waiting silently for the ringer's hand on Christmas morning.

A young man and a young woman were sitting on the chancel steps, with a heap of odorous pine and gleaming berries of the scented holly before them, from which they were deftly weaving a motto for the arch above the altar. He formed the tassels of the pine into long braids, and she sewed them upon a background of white, putting in here and there, an illumination from the holly heap before her.

She had a sweet, pure face. It was not beautiful, perhaps, but it was something better—it was brave, and true, and womanly. The light from the altar lamp fell over her yellow hair, and made it gleam like gold. Once, when she lifted her eyes to the arch above them, Cyril Dane thought of pictures he had seen of the Madonna.

Cyril Dane's face was fair enough, but it lacked the purity of Agnes Casleas's. Looking in at it, you would have surmised that his life had not always been so full of good impulses as on this Christmas Eve, when love was stirring his soul to new depths of tenderness, and making him resolve to be a better man in future, for the sake of the woman he loved, than he had been in the past for his own sake.

That Agnes Casleas loved him you could have told by her shy glance, and the soft, glad light of peace which brooded in her face. She loved him, and the old world seemed far off; her new world was full of rest and deep content.

Letter by letter the legend grew beneath their fingers: "Peace on Earth, Good-will to Men." Close by one of the windows a woman shivered in the storm. A woman clad in this and dragged garments with a wild, worn, look upon her face, as the light streamed out upon it through the narrow panes—a look pitiful to see on this Christmas night, or on any night. Her long hair streamed about her face, in the fierce force of the wind, and she shuddered and caught her breath with a quick gasp, as a fresh gust tore around the corner of the church, and eddied the white snow into her blinded eyes.

He pressed her faded face to the panes, and looked in. She saw the wreaths grow into shape and beauty beneath a wife and simple fingers, and crossed and festooned by skillful hands, from the odorless herbs of greenery. By and by her eyes wandered away toward the altar, and she saw the two sitting there together, at work on the grand old legend of the birthright of our Saviour, sung hundreds of years ago on the Judean plains, when angels told the world of the great gladness which the night had brought to them.

"Peace on Earth," she read. "As if there could be such a thing as peace!" she cried, bitterly, her eyes full of pitiful woe. "It is always peace! peace! that they preach to us; but there's no peace! If there is, I have not found it, and I never shall! Perhaps I don't deserve it. I don't know what ails me to-night. I feel just like getting away somewhere by myself, in the night and the storm, and loathing myself to death. I wonder if it's because it's Christmas night, and I used to be glad when Christmas came, but now it doesn't make any difference to me what the night or the day is. They're all alike, all alike! I wonder if I ain't better to be dead, when one gets to hate his life!"

"He doesn't seem to think of bitter things," she said, with cold lips. "He hasn't any ugly memories to trouble him. He never laments. It's only as women! I dare say he doesn't think of any one but that girl at his side. By his looks I judge he thinks there is but one woman in the world, and she is his. I wonder how long he will care for her. A month, probably; two or three of them, like enough; then a prettier face comes along, and good-bye to the old one. Oh, dear, dear! It's a bitter world! A bitter, cruel, cold world! I've known hearts that were colder than this storm is, though!"

The young man wore in the last tassel of pine, and the young woman fastened in the last cluster of hollyberries, and the motto was complete. The woman on side, looking in, saw him bend down suddenly, and kiss her. A warm wave of color leached over the fair face, and the clear pure eyes suddenly in his face in a look of perfect trust, and a woman's questioning love and confidence.
