QUESTIONS AND ANSWEIS.

There are a great many precautions about drinking water which have been handed down to us by the medical authorities from away back yonder. We respect medical authority — when it agrees with our own opinions—but when we are thirsty we drink, and nothing but water. We like it clear, fresh and cold, and we always endeavor to make sure that there are no fresh and cold, and we always endeavor to make sure that there are no typhoid bacilli, cholera spirilla, dysentery amoebae or other undesirable ingredients in it. And we do dislike to pay money for drinking water: that is, for water out of a bottle. It always seems such a shameful extravations, and second, free drinking gapes when a man buys a glass of fountains, where cold water and not to make sure that there are no in warm weather. Especially excessive consumption of animal nutriment instead of vegetables and fruits.

There are two great hygiene and moral improvements which American cities universally want: First, comfort stations, and second, free drinking fountains, where cold water and not

Boiling the water is one good old standby, if there is any question about its pollution with disease-producing organisms. But boiled water is distasteful to some people. If another means of disinfection is desired, the use of a good, fresh bleaching powder—chlorinated lime, or, as it is often called, "chloride of lime" — which should come only in tight tin cans and when opened should not give off a very intense chlorine odor. To render any water safe to drink, add to each gallon five grains of chlorinated lime; clear lake or mountain water will require only a grain or two for each gallon. This amount does not materially injure the taste of the water, yet makes it safe to drink if you are in doubt of its purity. And you must always be in doubt of water from springs or streams or lakes in inhabited sections.

When very hot, drink all the water you want, at meal time or between meals, and cold as you like, but without ice in the water. Ice sometimes conveys infection and ice water is an invention for which nature is not responsible in warm countries.

Cold water at meal time not only quenches thirst but also increases the secretion of gastric juice and aids digestion. This has been scientifically established, although it is contrary to the antique theory that one shouldn't bath.
